CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER, of New York, in the chair). The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado may have leave to complete his remarks before the special order is laid before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that will be the order of the Senate, and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter further says the people of the United States "can decide how much currency they will employ." They can, indeed, through their representatives, fix the volume of money, though it has happened even in popular governments that the people's deliberately expressed will has been repeatedly baffled or set at naught. This incident belongs to the recent past, and its recurrence is altogether possible. But suppose at a particular period there does not happen to exist a sufficient volume of the medium of exchange for the ready or convenient transaction of the business of the country, how, at this interesting point of time, can the people of the United States decide how much currency they will employ? Must not their decision as to the amount they will use be rigorously controlled by the aggregate of money available in the country?

I agree with the Secretary that the people have or should have the power to create it. But it can not be summoned into existence at a bidding any more than could Glendower "call spirits from the vasty deep." And, accepting the Secretary's happy illustration, I agree with him that with money as with beef the people may decide how much they will consume. But does the stock of beef which happens to be on the market have nothing to do in determining the amount of beef which the people will use? May not the Secretary himself be limited to fare more or less Spartan as the supply of lamb chops increases or diminishes? There can be but one response to these inquiries. Yet the Secretary, while he would doubtless earnestly desire the supply of beef and lamb chops should be abundant, seems to feel otherwise with reference to money. More beef, says the Secretary, but less money. Otherwise how shall we interpret his anxiety to retire every United States note—a non-interest-bearing debt—before 1889? This would be the late Secretary McCulloch's financiering over again, and with it would follow as its logical outcome a crash and disaster like that of 1873.

I dissent from the Secretary's figures in which he sets forth the addition to our annual taxation arising from the coinage of the silver dollars in the following words, from page 6 of this letter of March 2, 1886: "Forcing the silver accumulation is an addition of $24,000,000 per annum to the vast sum of our Federal taxation." The actual silver in the Treasury on January 1, 1886, as appears from a statement which is appended to the Secretary's response to the House of Representatives, is a fraction over $31,000,000. This sum is exclusive of the silver now in the Treasury representing outstanding certificates; only this can be deemed an accumulation. Now this amount of silver costs the Government per annum just what money is worth, what it can be borrowed for, namely, 3 per cent. Consequently the cost to the Government of having that amount of idle money in the Treasury is $930,000 per annum. But the Secretary says that "forcing the silver accumulation in the Treasury is an addition of $24,000,000 per annum to the vast sum of our Federal taxation." We have coined to January 30, 1886, two hundred and twenty millions of silver dollars. Save and excepting the $31,000,000 which I have mentioned not one dollar of silver is idle in any other sense than the gold in the Treasury, which represents outstanding gold certificates, is idle and is equally a burden upon the people. Now I would like to ask why the Secretary does not use the surplus of thirty-one millions of silver dollars now in the Treasury in the purchase of silver bullion, coin such bullion and use such coin for the next purchase of silver bullion, and so on. Surely this policy would not involve "an addition of $24,000,000 per annum to vast sums of Federal taxation."

Sir, these are questions more grave than that of the expulsion of gold from this country, even if such a thing were possible. I believe I have fairly shown, however, that such a thing is not possible. The difficulty with the Secretary and those who agree with him consists in this: That they all discuss national finances as though those having large moneyed interests and those with competencies and fixed incomes were the only people interested in the question. They remind me of Oscar Wilde in his disquisitions on interior and exterior decorations, the cost of which would require several small fortunes in their accomplishment.

The great strain of the classes I have mentioned seems to be to make the most they can out of already accumulated wealth. My essay is to establish a financial policy which, while sound and conservative, will open fair chances to those now having nothing to get a start in life, which they can never do under a policy which considers alone the interests of those already in easy circumstances.

Evidence that the Secretary reasons from the standpoint I have mentioned is furnished by himself; I read from page 16 of his letter, as follows:

A delusion has spread that the Government has authority to fix the amount of the people's currency, and the power and the duty. There is no semblance of such an absurdity in the Constitution, as the power granted to any department or division of this Government to determine, fix, or change the amount of money needed to satisfy the people's need for an instrument of circulation and exchange. There can be too much or too little. They do not need to convert all of their wealth, not even all of their gold and silver wealth, into a medium for circulating that wealth. They do need to apportion some of their wealth to that use, whatever economies, from the clearing-house to the book-account, they may practice; whatever substitutes, like the bill of exchange, notes, &c., or whatever representatives, like the coin certificate, they may employ. But between these extremes the Government is as incompetent to draw the line as unempowered. The people of the United States, however, can draw the line with perfect success.

The error in the first sentence of the extract I have just read seems to be a misconception as to what constitutes "the Government."

The second sentence of the Secretary is true, and so is the third.

In the fourth and fifth sentences, however, is to be found the evidence of the assertion made by me a few moments ago, "that they all discuss national finances as though those having large moneyed interests and those with competences and fixed incomes were the only people interested in the question."

Later on I shall speak in the interest of the rest of mankind, who have no competences nor fixed incomes, and shall take occasion to point out a legitimate manner of uprooting a plutocracy, the existence of which endangers the permanency of the Republic more than we like to admit, and in pointing out this manner will indicate the course which, in my judgment, will make this Government, created and controlled by the people, as permanent and enduring as the Pyramids or the Appian Way.

Mr. President, having shown, as I think, that a new basis for the issue of paper currency by our national banks must be provided for by law, and having given my views as to what would be a safe and proper basis for the future; having shown the dangerous power of our national banks over the volume of money; having pointed out with some precision the very considerable proportion of our general circulation, which is of no practical use as an active circulating medium, and that its volume is so contracted as to seriously embarrass the business interests and retard the general prosperity of the country, and having briefly commented upon the Secretary's letter, I shall now proceed to show the importance of silver coinage as a factor in the settlement of these and other questions.

Silver has received considerable consideration at the hands of Congress during the present session, but just at this time there seems to be a lull in regard to it at this end of the Capitol, a lull growing, perhaps, out of a disposition on the part of its enemies to let the cause of bimetallism sink or drift out of sight; but be this as it may, its friends do not intend to rest content with anything short of keeping it well to the front, and it may as well be said now as at any time that the contest will be waged with such persistence that all will understand that nothing short of the full establishment of a permanent bimetallic policy and the free unlimited coinage of silver dollars by this Government will ever settle the question.

Short of this we have no compromises to offer, believing as we do that the hour is at hand when this country should have a policy of its own on this and other great questions, and that the policy we advocate will best subserve the interests and promote the happiness and well-being not only of the people in this broad land but of those throughout the world. Such are the legitimate purposes of government everywhere, no matter how organized, whether directed by the people themselves or controlled by kings, emperors, and princes.

The practical demonstration of the power and ability of this people to govern themselves has long since had its influence in the Old World, and our policy, if well defined now upon the question under consideration, will in the end have a controlling influence on its settlement in all lands.

Silver coinage is the specter which affrights the souls of those who own our bonds made payable by law in coin and those whose fancied interests lie in a contraction of the currency on an expansion of population.

Issue has long been joined—the friends of silver and the opponents of contraction on one side and the classes of people just mentioned on the other. It is truly the war of the millions—millions of people upon the one side and millions of dollars upon the other.

The bill which I have introduced if enacted into law will end the controversy honorably to all parties, fair alike to the owners of silver, of gold, of bonds, fair alike to the people of the Government and the banks. If all this be true, the bitter contest so long waged between the bimetallists and monometallists will in the end prove to have been a blessing in disguise, as having led us up to a point where the close of the controversy finds the interests of all equally protected, a consummation devoutly to be wished.

The worst enemy of silver in this country would put up his sword and haul down his flag if he could know that bimetallism would become universally international upon a common ratio of value between gold and silver.

It is obvious to me, and I hope it may be so to others, that decisive action by the United States now—action which will be considered absolutely conclusive and final here—will force the wavering nations to what

I consider the second step, not the first, and that is an international congress, to be convened for the sole purpose of establishing a uniform ratio of value between silver and gold. All conferences heretofore held have proven barren of results for the simple reason that false issues have been allowed to crowd out the real one just mentioned. What I mean is this: That the first thing to be done is to settle the question in favor of the double standard so absolutely as to leave no doubt in the minds of other nations as to the permanency of the policy here; for, so long as this country, which produces half the silver of the world, maintains a doubtful, vacillating attitude, we can not hope that countries having no interest in silver production will volunteer a change from monometallism to bimetallism.

In England and in Germany where gold is the sole standard many financiers and political economists of great ability are already urging a return to the double standard, showing a marked change in public sentiment. I will now read a telegram, dated the 11th of February, which shows the growing power of the bimetallists in Germany:

LONDON, February 11.

A Reuter telegram from Berlin states that the motion introduced in the Reichstag by Herr Huene on behalf of the conservatives, urging a new and searching inquiry into the currency question, with a view to ascertain whether it would be better to adhere to monometallism or return to a double standard, was adopted to-day by a vote of 145 to 119.

The vote by which the motion was carried proves that it was no mere formal resolution of inquiry; 145 votes in the affirmative to 119 in the negative shows that a great contest occurred and that the motion prevailed after a desperate struggle. If we present an unbroken front and maintain with firmness our bimetallic policy Germany will be the first to remonetize silver, as she was the first to demonetize it, in which latter enterprise she had the company of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, so that we may fairly count on their future action being in accord with Germany on this question.

And the following telegram from England illustrates the changes I have referred to as taking place in that country:

LIVERPOOL, February, 1886.

At the meeting of the chambers of commerce in this city to-day Mr. Forwood, conservative member of Parliament from Lancashire and a prominent merchant and ship-owner of Liverpool, presided. He attributed the present depression in British trade to the appreciation of gold, assisted by the competition of foreign products and manufactures turned out by skilled labor improved by technical education.

The meeting of the chambers of commerce by a vote nearly unanimous resolved that "the depreciation of silver and its present tendency toward disuse as money are disturbing trade generally and England's eastern commerce in particular." Another resolution adopted by the meeting contained the following language: "We urge the government to unite with the other countries in an endeavor to restore silver to its former function as a legal tender, thereby giving it a permanent instead of a fluctuating value."

Mr. President, I make the broad assertion now and here that the coinage of all the silver produced in the past and all which may be produced in the future in the United States would have the same effect on the price of silver bullion in London and elsewhere as would be produced by entirely stopping the production of silver in this country, because the supply heretofore drawn from us would thus be cut off. If this be not true, then there is no such thing as the law of supply and demand. When we consider the fact that more than one-half of the people in the world use silver exclusively as money, while many millions more use both silver and gold, can any one doubt that if the United States, now producing one-half the silver of the world, should stop the production of it entirely, its price would bound upward to its old and proper place—15½ of silver to 1 of gold. Surely no one will deny or question this. Now, if, instead of stopping the production, we coin all that is produced into standard silver dollars, would not the effect upon the price of silver be the same as if its production were entirely abandoned? We would have a corner on one-half the silver of the world, thus reducing the amount left for the rest of mankind to the other half of the whole, because no other country can afford to buy our standard dollars, conceded to contain but about 80 cents of silver when measured by the price of silver bullion in the London market, which seems to be permitted to regulate its value, although I have never yet been able to learn why.

Is it not manifestly inevitable that the coinage and use at home of our entire silver product would so far reduce the amount available for the rest of the world that the price of silver bullion would at once begin to go up in London, which seems now to have a corner on its price while we have, approximately, a corner on its production? Is it not equally manifest that the price would continue to rise until our silver dollars would be at a premium over gold, for the reason that over there they fix the price of silver by a gold standard and that their ratio is 15½ silver to 1 in gold while with us the ratio is 16 to 1? And is it not furthermore manifest that as soon as the price of silver bullion is equal to or greater than the price of gold all objections to the double standard vanish? I can see no other reasonable conclusion. Certain it is that England could make no more money out of her barter in silver and would have no further interest in continuing its demonetization. Later on in the course of my remarks I will explain what her present interest in that regard is.

Returning now to the subject of monetary conferences, I repeat the thought before expressed, that the first thing to be accomplished is to establish the double standard. Then, and not before, is the only proper time to discuss and determine the ratio between silver and gold; for so long as we attempt to "put the cart before the horse" just so long will all such conferences run into the discussion of the first question—the general policy of bimetallism—instead of the question of ratio, which is the second. Entertaining these views, I am unalterably opposed to all such conferences now, because until the first great question is definitely settled, it seems to me idle to talk about fixing an international ratio of value.

The very able and distinguished men in and out of Congress who speak and write upon the other side of this question overlook the absurdity of permitting the price of silver to be fixed as it now is by the London market; by a country which does not produce an ounce of this precious metal; a country whose most important interest lies in procuring cheap silver for use in India, where it has nearly completed vast systems of railway and other avenues of transportation whereby it is sought to build up competition with the producers of this country by stimulating the production in India of similar commodities to our own. Considering that silver is the only legal tender there—gold is not—it most clearly appears why England wants cheap silver which she now buys as bullion, coins it, uses it to build up our chief competitor, and in doing so makes 30 cents on every dollar of silver used in India, and may be paid out there at its coin value by England which buys the silver at its bullion value. No wonder England wants cheap silver. She demonetizes it at home, makes it the only money of India, fixes the price of our silver product, and seems to be regulating the whole business.

Sir, a man—a seller—who in his private affairs would permit a buyer to fix a price upon the property for sale, and actually buy it at such price, a seller, too, who himself controlled half the product of the world in that line, would stand convicted of most stupendous stupidity. Yet so it is that this Government is permitting England to do just such a thing with our silver interests, bearing down its price while interested in building up a competitor to this great country and using our silver to enable her to do so. She arrogates to herself the position of both prosecutor and judge, and her decisions never deviate from the line of her direct interests. So long as this country maintains a wavering position on the question of bimetallism we lose half the ground gained by the remonetization of 1878. Had our Government through its officials carried out in good faith the will of the people expressed by the law of that year, the double standard would long ere this have been an accomplished fact throughout Europe. Even as it is the monometallists are on the retreat in Germany and elsewhere, and it should be the unswerving purpose of the friends of bimetallism here to crowd them; not by misrepresentation, ridicule, or abuse, but with firm fairness, using the honest weapons of fact, illustration, and argument.

Official data show that on November 1, 1885, there was in the country gold and bullion, five hundred and eighty-seven millions; silver and bullion, three hundred and eight millions—total, eight hundred and ninety-five millions.

I may say, taking round numbers, we had at the date mentioned six hundred millions of gold and three hundred millions of silver. Our stock of gold is not increased by the production of our mines, as their supply is now barely sufficient to meet the consumption of gold in manufactures, &c., and there is no promise of any considerable increase in gold production. If silver is to be demonetized we shall have only six hundred millions of gold on which to base our paper currency. It is true that four hundred millions of gold have been brought here since the coinage of the silver dollar was resumed; and it continues to come, to the bewilderment and confusion of the severe logicians who have repeatedly and conclusively demonstrated, to their own satisfaction at least, that so far from coming here we would inevitably lose that which we had.

The most recent statement from the Treasury Department shows that during the last year our gold imports exceeded our exports by twelve millions; while the exports of silver exceeded the imports by sixteen millions. In such facts as these we see how the impossible has come to pass; the gold coming to us and not fleeing from us; the silver going abroad, instead of the United States becoming its selected dumping-ground. If such eccentricity of results is to continue, if gold persistently comes and silver perversely goes from us, will not our faith in human reason become sapped and broken down? Our friends on the other side of the question should seriously contemplate this possible calamity, and should in some way guard us against such tremendous consequences. Yet the philosophers may, if they will, take some hope, even from the figures I have given; for they may point to the fact that the gold which is now coming here is too insignificant in amount to be of material advantage to us, and there are no present signs of increasing importations. So that whether there are other dominant and determining considerations or not, I hold that we are forced to the use of the other precious metal in order to obtain the adequate and indispensable currency basis.

The silver now in the country amounts to $5 per capita. Upon this a perfectly sound and stable paper currency of $10 per capita may be based. Needing, as I insist, at least $30 per capita of active circulating medium, we shall, if demonetization of silver is effected, virtually take away the means whereby one-third of that circulation may be created; and what is the argument for this demonetization? How has it been shown that silver is no longer useful as a money metal? Its value and utility as money can hardly be successfully impeached in the face of the fact that silver to-day constitutes more than one-half of the metal money of the world, as in the earlier past it constituted three-fourths of it. Its fluctuations, so called, may have terror for a few holders of bonds, but have not seriously disturbed the unnumbered millions who continue to use it as currency. Nor has the fact yet been established, though it has been asserted with a noisy vehemence sufficient of itself to discredit the assertion, that silver has really declined in value or purchasing power. Now, what has been proven? It has only been shown that on the money marts of London silver has within the last ten years become less valuable as a gold equivalent; that it will buy less gold than it would in 1873.

Measured, however, not by the standard of gold alone, but by a truer one, by that furnished by the prices of the world's multitudinous products which we consume, the food we eat, the clothes we wear, as well as the houses we build and the railroads we construct, it can not be made to appear that within any period of the recent past has the purchasing power of silver lost the smallest fraction of its value. In short, this value has been constant, tried not by fanciful but by genuine tests of economic value. Hence it may be fairly insisted that in silver, and silver alone, we have the precious metal which, as it will constantly add to the volume of our metal money while gold can not, is essential to that expansion of currency which so long as wise legislation rules the hour will be kept commensurate with our growing wealth and numbers. This important function is denied to silver by its enemies, because, they say, we shall be deluged with silver, or, changing the figure, we shall become the dumping-ground of the world, even by the maintenance of our present limited coinage. Precisely how this is to happen has not been described, possibly because the process would be at once curious and complicated. It would certainly require an unusual resource of invention and mastery of words to describe it.

Our opponents are wise in not attempting to show how this unhappy state of affairs is to be brought about, or what have been or what are to be the concatenation of causes or events. Shall silver be dumped here because we have done or may do something, or are these gentlemen simply masquerading as prophets, honestly persuaded, no doubt, that upon them has fallen the mantle of the seer, that the visioned trance is theirs alone, and that the dumping will only follow incidents, accidents, happenings wholly fortuitous? We are assured that the dumping is not to be "a perhaps;" it has been ordained to be. Let me say if this be really so, upon what grounds do these gentlemen object to the freest use of silver in the payment of our bonded obligations?

If silver shall come here from abroad it is because there is profit in bringing it here, and that profit must come from exchanging silver for gold on advantageous terms, and if this can be done why should the holder of our interest obligations object to receiving his quarterly and semi-annually mites in the white metal instead of the yellow? He knows he can get his gold when he wants it, and he pays practically nothing for the conversion. Yet in spite of auguries I suspect that silver will hasten slowly to our shores. It will come with laggard step and only as we want it. But there are sundry practical difficulties in the way of its being dumped here from abroad. Those obstacles have been so fully stated by my late colleague, ex-Senator Hill, in an address delivered at Providence, R. I., I can not do better than quote from his lucid statements.

> As to the dumping upon us of foreign silver, it is as impossible as the dumping upon us of foreign wheat, and for the same reason, namely, that we produce more than we consume. Our use of silver, in coining dollars under the act of 1878, and in the arts, is less than the production of our mines. The excess of their yields beyond the demands of manufacturers and of our mints must necessarily be exported, and must fall to a price at which it can be exported. An importation of silver from Europe is impossible, because that continent has no stock excepting its coinages, in which silver is rated about 20 per cent. higher than it will command to-day in our markets.

My present colleague [Mr. TELLER] in his recent speech here also met these objections in such a plain practical manner that I think a repetition of his exact words will be useful in this connection.

I quote as follows:

> The opponents of the unlimited coinage of silver declare that if adopted in the United States all the silver of the world will find its way to our mints to be coined into dollars; that these dollars will drive out all the gold; that we will be left with silver only. If the foreign holder of silver brings it to our mints and coins it into dollars the dollars so coined will be his property and not that of the United States or the people thereof. How can it be valuable to him over and above its bullion value except by its use here as money? If he wants to buy gold with it he must offer the American holder of gold so much silver that the holder of gold will consider the exchange a profitable transaction. Such exchange is wholly dependent on the consent of the holder of gold. His consent can not be obtained unless he sees it to his interest to do so, and if it is to his interest, it can hardly be to the detriment of the rest of the people.
> If the holder of the silver dollar can not buy gold on profitable terms he will not buy. Gold ought to be as valuable to the American holder as to the holder of silver coin, whether he be an American holder or a foreign holder. Why should the foreign holder of silver be willing to pay more for gold than our own people? The foreign holder of silver after having it coined at our mints must make use of it either by taking it out of the country, by hoarding it, or by its use here as money. If he takes it out of the country, no harm is done; if he hoards it, no one is injured here; if he uses it as money, he must either buy gold, American products, or invest it permanently in the country. In either case we shall get the full equivalent for his silver or he will decline to take it.

It is, however, urged by some that the objection is not to the use of silver as metallic money, but to the coin called "one dollar," which contains only 412½ grains of silver and alloy, instead of a sufficient number of grains to put it on an equality with the price of silver bullion in London. This objection, equally with sundry others, has been so abundantly met I can hardly do more than present in my own and less happy phrases the views with which the Senate and the country are already familiar. The irresistible answer is that the dollar of to-day is the identical dollar of the past, its exact counterpart in fineness and in weight of silver, quantitatively and qualitatively its absolute equal. It is not necessary to tell us that abroad, in Lombard street, London, it has not the value of the gold dollar. That fact is apropos of nothing. We are not seeking to establish an international currency. That task will come later. Our essay now and here is to maintain the bimetallic standard, and so far we have done it. The silver dollar will buy here as much of anything as a gold dollar, and stands on a parity with it for all purposes.

I am confident that from the complete remonetization of silver, its re-established use as a money metal, there will flow widespread and beneficent results, in which the whole people of the country will share. It is in my view an indispensable step in the creation and maintenance of that all-sufficient and stable circulating medium, without which there can be no healthy business activity. With an adequate currency our laborers will command better wages, our farmers will get higher prices for their products, and our furnaces and looms will again throb with a restored vitality.

But there are other and far-reaching consequences to follow the complete remonetization of silver, affecting special interests, and these of the greatest magnitude and of the most vital concern, which have been hitherto not thoroughly estimated.

Mr. Ivan C. Michels, who has in course of preparation an elaborate paper on the subject of our foreign trade for the use of the National Bimetallic Coinage Association, has kindly furnished me with the striking facts which I will now present. They will need little comment from me, because they are their own best argument and commentary. The statistics to which I am about to refer have been gathered with the most painstaking care, and their general accuracy I have personally verified. I shall use only round numbers to avoid the repetition of insignificant amounts. These tabulated statements show that from 1873 (when free coinage of silver was abolished in the United States) to 1885 the export of wheat from India rose from 100,000 bushels to 45,000,000 bushels. In twelve years the wheat exports were more than one hundred times quadrupled. This amazing development was not due to chance.

The effect upon our cotton and wheat exports resulting from our policy on the silver question has often been referred to by speakers and writers, but with such brevity of statement that the actual relation between the declining price of silver and the coincident fall in the price of wheat and cotton—this relation of cause and effect—was not adequately explained. The pertinent facts in the case have not been set forth with that fullness of detail which is necessary to carry conviction to the average intellect. I have, therefore, with some care brought together such data—deriving the substance of all from the labors of Mr. Michels—as can not fail to throw a strong and clear light upon this important subject.

The cultivation of this great staple in India has been most sedulously encouraged and stimulated by the English Government. To obtain a marketable grain, and to secure the most immediate and most profitable results, the English have carefully watched and supervised both the planting and the gathering of the crop. They have supplied the natives with selected seed of the best foreign varieties, and have gratuitously distributed among them agricultural implements and machinery of the most approved patterns.

But facilities of transportation to the seaboard of the Indian products were no less indispensable. To provide these the English Government has built, and is building, trunk and tributary lines of railroads and canals, some long since finished and nearly all well advanced toward completion.

The report of the Indian director-general, dated March 31, 1885, shows that at that date there were 12,000 miles of railroad open to traffic, while upward of 3,500 miles of road were in course of construction. The total outlay for railroads and connecting steamboat lines up to the date mentioned reached $800,000,000; and the construction of nearly 1,500 miles of new lines has been recently decided upon. The earnings of the roads in operation show that as purely commercial ventures they are profitable investments, while their value in a military point of view is beyond all estimate. So that the natives were first taught how to raise wheat, and next were supplied with the means of sending it to a market.

The success which has attended this effort of the English Government to utilize its Indian labor and create a competition to this country in wheat production, and thus secure for the English people another source of supply, is shown in the figures already given. And we, who are supposed to reflect the will and protect the interests of the American people, have come to the aid of the English Government in this work. We rendered the most efficient help possible by a single stroke of legislation—by the demonetization of silver. And the effects of that act linger to-day. Although no longer in force it has, in conjunction with the policy of other nations, driven silver and gold farther and farther apart until silver is now, measured by the gold standard, 20 per cent. cheaper than it was in 1873.

To-day the English purchasers of Indian wheat are able to pay for it in a coin, the silver rupee, which costs them 30 per cent. less than the money which would be required to pay for wheat imported from the United States. To make this clear, I must state that the rupee is a legal tender in India, and that its ratio to gold is 14.28 to 1. This difference of ratio alone between our standard and the Indian standard gives to the English buyer an advantage amounting to 10 per cent.; and, as silver bullion on the London market sells for 20 per cent. below the value of our silver coin, it is manifest that there is at once established a difference of 30 per cent. in prices in favor of the Indian wheat raisers and consequently against our own.

Competing in the world's market our wheat is inevitably forced down, approximately, to the Indian price. What this amounts to in dollars we shall see. Taking our last year's crop at 350,000,000 bushels, there was a clear loss to our farmers, from the causes stated, of over $70,000,000, while we have on hand, of unmarketed wheat, 57,000,000 bushels against one-third of that volume three years ago.

Our cotton interests have also suffered in the same way. The cultivation of cotton in India has been carefully watched and fostered by the English Government, so that in this field also our supremacy is no longer assured. Though cotton is not discrowned, this sovereignty includes India as well as the United States. India has the same vast cotton-belts that we have, the same rich alluvion, similar climatic conditions, and immeasurably cheaper labor. But in addition to all these advantages, the English buyers have the cheap silver which we supply.

The development of cotton production is best shown by the growth of the cotton exports from India. These exports have increased from 650,000 bales in 1879, to one and a half million bales four years later; or the export from India in 1883 amounted to about one-fourth of our whole cotton crop. The cotton manufactures of India show a similar growth. The consumption of cotton by the native manufactories has more than doubled since 1879, and the export of manufactured goods has risen from 14,000,000 yards in 1876 to 55,000,000 yards in 1885, or has quadrupled in nine years. On the other hand, the exports of manufactured goods from the United States have fallen from 14,000,000 yards in 1880 to 12,000,000 yards in 1885. And here I must mention as a pertinent and noteworthy fact that the price of cotton has steadily kept pace with, has in no year shown any reaction from, the declining value of silver in the London market. The following figures sufficiently illustrate this fact:

Average price of silver and cotton in London for the years 1882 to 1885, inclusive.

	Pence.	Cents.
1883	50¼	10.64
1884	50¼	10.54
1885	49	8.90

*Per ounce. †Per pound.

That these changes in the price of cotton were not brought about by the varying volume of our crop for these several years will appear from what I shall now read:

	Bales.	Price.*
Total crop for 1882	5,400,000	$0 10.79
Total crop for 1883	7,000,000	10.64
Total crop for 1884	5,800,000	10.54
Total crop for 1885	6,500,000	8.90

* Average price per pound.

Comparing the crops of 1882 and 1884 it will be seen that the crop of the latter year exceeded the crop of the former by four hundred thousand bales, and the price in 1884 was one-fourth of a cent lower per pound than in 1882. Two mills per pound would fairly represent the decline in silver between the periods mentioned. Comparing the crop of 1883 with 1885 it will be observed that though the crop of the latter year fell short of the crop of the former by a half million bales, yet the average price in 1885 was one cent and three-quarters lower than during the year when the large crop was produced.

I do not mean to insist that the declining prices of cotton are due wholly to the declining prices of silver. Other causes have assisted, and chief among these is the rival cotton crop which India is able to produce. It is only in the calm consideration of such figures as I have given, and in intelligently recognizing the true causes, that we may learn how to so shape our legislation as to protect in the future these special, yet truly imperial, interests—interests which come close to the pockets of two-thirds of the people of this Union. Can there be any doubt as to the meaning of these results—present, existing results—and also the portentous consequences foreshadowed for the future?

Our entire annual silver production amounts to $48,000,000. Yet cheap silver cost our wheat growers $70,000,000 in one year; and the decline of 1¾ cents per pound in cotton since 1883 would amount to, on last year's crop at $8 per bale, the sum of $52,000,000. There is no element of fancy in this statement. The figures are accessible to any one who cares to investigate the matter; and it seems to me there is no escape from the lessons of warning and instruction which they convey to us. He must be willfully blind who can not see it. English financial writers show how thoroughly they appreciate the advantages which the English merchants who trade with India derive from the cheap silver with which we are supplying them. A writer in the London Economist, of recent date, deplores our continued coinage of the silver dollar. And why? Because, he says (I quote), "it can not be to their interest that the trade of one of their best customers should be undermined by a deteriorated currency." This observation is sentimentally meaningless.

But mark the following words of this writer. I quote:

Nor is it to the advantage of trade—

He means English trade—that millions of a valuable product, such as silver, should either be heaped up useless in a state vault or applied to a wrong purpose. Set free, it will be so much added to the volume of exchangeable products and to the world's commerce.

Do these words need translation to this body or to the American people? He says if this Government continues to coin the silver dollar, whether it is afterward heaped up or not, the English people will be deprived of that much cheap silver. If it is "set free," using the writer's language, "to be added to the volume of exchangeable products and the world's commerce," we simply hand to Great Britain the cudgel, or the bludgeon rather, with which to gradually drive us from the world's markets.

The writer I have quoted goes on to add that he is not afraid that India will be overwhelmed with silver, even should we set ours free. I suspect not. The English can use all we may send, and will be content to get more. Should we send our entire silver product it would barely be sufficient to pay for the annual Indian cotton exports alone. So that there is a ready foreign demand, limited, however, to one nation, for every ounce of silver we can spare. Shall we continue to send it abroad? That is the question. Shall we continue to send it while it is so largely contributing to the building up of a formidable rival in the production of those two great staples of the world which we have hitherto supplied; to the building up of a country where the average price of labor is 6 cents per day? Certainly the enthusiasm of our farmers, planters, and laborers in favor of such a policy will not be very gushing.

Sir, to send away another ounce of silver is suicidal, because the more silver bullion we send to England the cheaper it will be there, and the cheaper it is there the cheaper can India's wheat and cotton be produced. In the face of all these facts, I submit that there is but one course to be pursued, and that is to coin the entire output of silver from our mines and thus cut off that much of the supply from the London market, the inevitable effect of which will be, from the fact that we produce half the silver of the world, to raise not only the price of silver but also the cost of producing wheat and cotton in India as well, thus directly benefiting every laborer and producer in this land. Let some worshiper of the "golden calf" answer these things if he can.

Awaiting such answer, I pass to a brief examination and consideration of our national debt.

The act of Congress of February 25, 1862, under which the 5-20 6 per cent. bonds were issued, also authorized the issue of one hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender notes, and it was provided that they should be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, referring of course to the interest on bonds of the United States, which interest was by the same act made payable in coin. Silver dollars under the law then possessed the full money function; were a legal tender for all debts, public and private. These legal-tender notes were likewise made exchangeable for United States bonds.

Inasmuch as the principal of these bonds were not by law made payable in any particular kind of money, they could justly and lawfully have been paid in legal-tender notes (greenbacks) according to the rule of law declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1884. As the time approaches when the Government might—under its option to pay after five years, legal-tender notes then being much below par—pay off these bonds the cry was raised that not only the interest, but the principal as well, ought to be paid in coin, but no claim for payment in gold coin was then made (silver was then at a premium over gold). Finally an act was passed, in 1869, making the principal as well as the interest of these bonds payable in coin generally—not gold coin, simply coin. The subsequent acts of Congress authorizing the issue of bonds, including the 5, 4½, 4, and 3 per cents., likewise made all such bonds, principal and interest, payable simply in coin—meaning, of course, silver coin as well as gold coin. Now, Mr. President, I submit that we have gone far enough, and let us draw the line right here.

These bonds are payable in coin, and when we pay them let it be done as stipulated in the contract. Those most interested know they can not secure the passage of a law making them payable in gold coin, but they also know that if the coinage of silver dollars is stopped they will get gold coin for principal as well as interest because of the lack of silver coins; and they are even willing to leave undisturbed the standard silver dollars already constituting part of our money, the amount of those dollars being so insignificant when compared with the amount of our bonded debt, the amount of such dollars being less than two hundred and fifty millions, while the bonded debt reaches the sum of fourteen hundred millions. It is a well-chosen position, it is the only standing-ground these people have left; hence they are found in one solid phalanx fighting for the suspension of silver coinage, and in the contest they are arraying every interest and every prejudice opposed to silver. They are too wise to appeal directly for the payment of these bonds in gold, but are utilizing every power within their control to stop the coinage of silver, in which, if successful, their point is gained.

We hear much said about the public faith and the national honor. As has been shown, the public debt may be paid in standard silver dollars without any breach of faith or loss of national honor, and I say now that the public faith of this Government toward our own people is, to say the least, a matter of as great concern as the public faith toward the holders of our bonds. It is not necessary to swindle either.

No man is more earnestly in favor of sustaining the national credit and the national honor than myself, but I do not deem it necessary for these purposes to pay the principal of a single bond before its maturity. If we pay the interest promptly we shall have done all that is necessary, and I am frank to say that I am opposed to the rapid payment of our bonded debt. These debts were created to preserve the Union; and I indulge the hope that this Union may last forever—that unborn millions may receive and may transmit the blessings of civil and religious liberty to millions more who will follow them. With this priceless legacy it is only fair that these coming millions should bear their just proportion of the cost.

Our ability to pay this debt is conceded throughout Christendom. And if sixty millions of people can pay it without feeling distress, one hundred and twenty millions will look upon it as a mere bagatelle, and double that number will scarcely realize the effort of its extinguishment.

We have other uses for the surplus, and I will now say what I promised early in the course of my remarks to say. We can put in circulation the amount of money I have suggested as being necessary in many ways besides by the payment of bonds or the remission of internal-revenue taxes. We can build a navy which will make our flag respected upon every ocean and in every port in the world. We can create coast defenses which will constitute every seaport of ours a Gibraltar.

We can construct canals for the benefit of the people; we can build houses for the use of the Government in every county seat in the United States, and thus cut off the drain continually going on in payment of rents. But enough of this. These suggestions need no argument to back them. The mere mention shows that there is no difficulty in getting our money into circulation. I might enumerate ways and means to accomplish this end without limit, but will not consume the time. The claim that we must crowd the call and payment of bonds in order to rid the Treasury of its surplus is the thinnest of gauze. It is a mere subterfuge, a delusion, and a snare.

The payment of bonds gives no relief to the toiling millions. They have no bonds. Better by far is it to let the owners of bonds hold them, because the bonds are less dangerous than money in the hands of those who enhance its power by hoarding it in the hands of the few at the great money centers where there is too much already.

A plethora of money at the great centers is the unfailing indication of scarcity elsewhere. The payment of bonds only aggravates the trouble by augmenting the volume at the very places where active money is not needed. The only relief is to stimulate enterprise and thus put the money in circulation among the people. Prosperous France is an example, which proves the beneficent effects of a well distributed circulation. There the money is held by the people instead of the banks at the great centers, and hard times are now unknown. This is the great secret of prosperity there, and the sooner we understand and act upon it the better.

The debt of this nation at the close of the war reached the enormous sum of over $2,800,000,000. On this there has been paid $3,400,000,000, of which nineteen hundred millions were on account of interest, leaving still a bonded debt of about $1,400,000,000.

This generation has gone far enough in its efforts to extinguish this debt. It has done more than its part, and I repeat with emphasis that since posterity will reap its full share of the benefits secured by the expenditure of this vast sum received for these bonds, it should be left to discharge its fair proportion of the debt.

Sir, the history of the last quarter of a century proves that the financial legislation of the United States has not been in the interest of the people. On the contrary, it is blazoned all over with cumulative evidence, amounting in the aggregate to positive proof, that the grand central idea has been to aggrandize those whose overflowing coffers have enabled them to utilize each and every step in the merciless scheme for their own selfish purposes to protect the moneyed interest and that alone.

Beginning with the issue of Government bonds in 1862, which were issued and paid for in greenbacks, then 40 to 50 cents below par, down to this very moment there has been no relaxation of effort in the direction just mentioned. Under various alluring and sometimes patriotic titles bill after bill has been introduced, and many enacted into law, the effect of which has been to tighten the grip of the aristocracy of cash on the throat of the aristocracy of labor. The national-bank issues constituted the first decisive step. The law authorizing such issue remitted the power of the Government over the volume of money to private corporations, and to-day we find ourselves at their mercy, groaning under the weight of a contracted currency, falling prices, stifled industries, and general business stagnation.

If any one doubts the effect of a contracted volume of money, let him inquire of himself how he could pay debts long ago contracted if this volume should be still further decreased to one-half its present amount, and, if not satisfied, let him imagine the volume reduced to one-tenth of what it is now. The man who can not understand the effect of contraction, not only as to his debts, but on his labor and his property as well, lacks the intelligence to be a good American citizen. And yet so it is, that we have seen this Government shorn of all power over the volume of money, and thousands of people do not seem to understand what has been the instrument with which their throats have been cut. Why, sir, this one power which has been unwisely given away is sufficient to ruin the country, if all other conditions to prosperity were in perfect order.

Now let us look at the process of contraction which has been steadily going on for many years. Under the administration of Mr. McCulloch, as Secretary of the Treasury, the volume of money was reduced from two thousand millions down to seven hundred millions.

Then came laws authorizing the retirement of the circulation of national banks, thus giving those institutions the power to contract the currency; while on the other hand a law was passed repealing all laws limiting the circulation of the banks, thus giving them the power to inflate the currency at will. These two provisions are the ones which riveted the shackles upon the people and constituted them a nation of slaves to the extent of depriving them of all power over the volume of money, which, as I have already said, is the power which regulates the price of all property and all labor. No man knows to-day at what moment he will find himself in the death-grip of contraction or whirling along in the mad tornado of the wildest inflation. The two provisions of law referred to have substituted a policy of three balls in lieu of just and sound principles of finance. We are continually reminded that the banks can issue all the money needed for use in carrying on the business of the country. True, enough; they could if they would, but they never have, and they never will, unless it subserves their own interests, and those interests, without exception, lie in the direction of a contracted currency, because they deal directly in money and control nearly the whole of it; hence the less there is, they being in possession of what there is, the more valuable it becomes to them.

Sir, is it not high time to divest the banks of these powers and restore them to the Government, where they justly and properly belong? For one I answer, yes. From beginning to end, at every stage of our past financial legislation the one great effort has been to give the control over the volume of our money to the national banks. In season and out of season do we hear from a majority of those representing these corporations that the legal tender should be retired, and that national-bank notes should constitute our entire paper circulation. We hear it in their speeches, we are deluged with their pamphlets, and we are hammered with this one idea in private conversation. Not content in the exercise of the extraordinary and dangerous power over this subject already possessed by them, their aim is to further intrench themselves by getting rid of United States notes and silver dollars, thus making themselves our absolute masters in this regard.

We are told in plain Anglo-Saxon by some of their less discreet speakers that Congress is not fit to be trusted with this power over the volume of our currency. A nightmare, which they are pleased to term inflation, is ever present with them; is the burden of their song, and those who can not sing, keep step to the music. Their fear is manifest by their seeming solicitude for the welfare of the people. They fear that easy times will lead the people into extravagance and luxurious living, and end in bankruptcy and ruin. Coming from those whose lives are one continued round of luxury amounting to satiety, men who are not soothed by slumber nor pleased with pleasure because they know nothing, absolutely nothing, of the humble walks of life, how shallow, hypocritical, and merciless is all this.

Sir, I am in favor of an ample amount of currency, because I know that the prosperity and happiness of the whole people is best advanced by increased and healthy activity in all branches of enterprise and industry. I do not fear the consequences of giving more chances and more ease to the people, and if any doubt exists as to whether we have too little or too much money, I would render that doubt in favor of the latter. Still, sir, I am not an inflationist, although I reserve the right to decide for myself as to the proper amount of circulation necessary for the country, and as to whether the sum I believe in amounts to inflation.

Looking at both sides of the question, I can see no advantage to the people at large in a contracted circulation. Its evils are ever with us. No man without means can even fairly start on the road to prosperity, much less travel it. The path of contraction is the path of gloom and despair, where nothing flourishes; where there is neither fruit nor blossoms of hope. I truly believe that even if an ample volume of money should bring in each decade the dire disasters depicted by the contractionists that even then the great masses of the people would be the gainers. For myself, I would rather have an occasional chance to try for success, to indulge in hope, even to meet the phantom of failure in the end, than to grope around forever in the darkness of the slough of despond without a ray of hope or even a single chance.

Mr. President, in this world's great field of battle, in the race of life, God Almighty intended that every human being should have a fair chance, else that hope which springs eternal in the human breast would never have been planted. There is not a being on earth, save those who have been wearied and worn out, or crushed between the upper and nether mill-stone of abject poverty and utter hopelessness, who has not his plans and aspirations in life. Destroy these plans, crush these aspirations, and there is nothing left of him.

The messenger boy who, running in hot haste, delivers stocks on Wall street, hopes some day to be a broker's clerk; the clerk hopes to become a junior partner, and finally the head of the firm; the head of the firm aspires to be a bank president; the bank president to be a Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary of the Treasury to be President of the United States; and the President hopes, by reason of duty well performed, to live forever in the hearts of his countrymen.

The miner on the night-shift, working deep down in the bosom of mother earth, as he eats his dinner at midnight in sight of wealth to uncover which years of toil and thousands of money have been required, dreams and hopes that his prospect hole near by on the same great mineral belt will develop bonanza by and by.

The stage driver as he sits upon his box and tells you in confidence how he traded off a poor horse for a good one without authority from "the old man," a term of endearment as well as description universally applied to the proprietor of the line by the knights of the whip, hopes that his sagacity and loyalty will soon be rewarded by promotion to the position of route agent, with further chances in the future.

The civil engineer who by the use of latitudes and departures in his underground surveys, where by reason of local attractions the needle fails to be reliable, traces with unerring certainty the deflections and angles of the workings of the mine, thus enabling him to fix upon the surface the exact spot for the sinking of a shaft to connect accurately with the stopes and drifts below; or who by triangulation where the face of the earth upon rugged mountains will not admit of running an actual and direct line can give you the exact course and distance from one point to another, no matter how far apart these points may be, hopes some day to leave the drifts and tunnels and their poison of dynamite and escape the dangers of the avalanche and the glacier by being called to the position of chief engineer of some great constructing railway where there is less work, less danger, and more pay, or to the surveyor-generalship of some thriving young Territory and finally to a seat in this august body, a possibility which ripened into a reality in the great State now so ably represented on this floor by my distinguished friends from Nebraska.

Sir, I might go on for hours with such illustrations, but will not. Let it suffice to repeat now what I have already said, that every human being has his hopes and aspirations, and I may add right here that he is entitled to them.

The great question is, Shall this Government issue a declaration of financial independence? A declaration not only against Europe, but against the organized enemies at home. The war of the contractionists is not based upon the fact that silver will add too much to the volume of money. A more subtle issue is involved. With bimetallism firmly established here they know the nations of the earth will be forced into the same line of financial policy; they know we can not accumulate silver and gold enough to furnish the necessary amount of hard cash to do the business of this country; they therefore hope that with the single standard of gold once established, thus destroying more than half the metallic money of the country, the possibility of a specie basis here lapses into an impossibility, and that of necessity this country will be remitted to a choice between greenbacks based solely on the sovereignty, honor, good faith, and credit of the nation on one side and national-bank notes on the other.

If human wisdom proves so frail as to allow this choice to be forced upon us I declare myself now, without mental reservation, that as between the two I am in favor of the greenbacks. The one is just as much fiat money as the other, the greenback being the direct issue of money by the Government, while the national-bank note is the issue of the bank secured by Government bonds; so that as far as a question of safety is involved there is but little, if any, difference between the two. Successful in this controversy the contractionist will be master of the situation, because the same influences which can demonetize silver could and would leave the banks with absolute control as to the volume of money, and this control as I have shown is the prize for which they fight. Truly, truly, this is the war of the millions.

Mr. President, the fight upon silver is the result of a belief on the part of our opponents that it was the weakest point in our line of battle. Two years ago it looked that way; but the scenes have since been shifted, so that to-day, thank God, we stand here not simply trying to defend and protect the limited-coinage act of 1878, but as aggressors demanding the free and unlimited coinage of silver and defying the usurpers of sovereign power; demanding this coinage not from a standpoint of local self-interest but upon the broad ground that it is best for the whole country, best for the entire world, and strictly in accord with correct financial principles.

Mark how we are answered by our opponents. One gentleman speaks of the "slippery silver dollar." Sir, there never has been but one time in its history when it appeared slippery, and that was in 1873, when it was slipped out of the list of legal-tender coins so quietly—the revision of the statutes being used as the vehicle—that Congress did not then know it had been demonetized, nor did the President of the United States for a long time afterward. If by the term "slippery" it was intended to be called slick or smooth it exhibited its capacity in that line when it smoothly went back to its place as a legal-tender coin in 1879; not, however, by any such back-door trail as it was slipped out by, but through the open doors of Congress after a square fight.

Another says:

All the bankers and bullion dealers in the world know that Uncle Sam will sooner or later find out the trick of the bonanza kings, and that when found out their advocates in the Senate or elsewhere will find it hard to get a hearing among business men, or to justify themselves among working men. Fortunate may it be for them if they are saved from being mobbed by the workingmen, &c.

Sir, this is the quintessence of gall. I can imagine that mob of workingmen led on in their wild fury by the horny-handed son of toil who perpetrated what I have just read—a man whose chief industry consists in resting his intellect in reflecting the views of those who neither know nor care anything whatever about the millions who labor for bread.

Another says:

The coinage of silver is kept up solely in the interest of a handful of adventurers in the Rocky Mountains represented in the Senate of the United States by a set of cowboy and sage-brush statesmen.

This terrific onslaught, intended for argument, was no doubt considered a settler by the person who uttered it. His ignorance is the only apology that could be offered for him.

Sir, this man, in so far as he alluded to Colorado, was not aware that he was talking about a State greater in natural resources than the great State of Pennsylvania. Our supply of coal is as great or greater. Our iron exists in quantities inexhaustible. The steel rails we manufacture are the best in the world, and the material necessary for their production is beyond computation. We produce coal oil. We have millions of acres of lumber lands. We raise the finest wheat on earth in quantities excelled by none. We took the first premium on flour at the Paris exposition. Our potatoes are the finest in the world and more to the acre. We raise oats, barley, and rye equal to any and better than most. Our cattle roam upon a thousand hills. Now, when we add to all these things our supply of silver bullion, which constitutes one-fourth of the product of the whole earth, and our gold bullion, which in amount is not insignificant, do I not prove conclusively that our natural resources are greater than those of the great State I have mentioned? Our people are essentially cosmopolitan; every State in the Union and every nationality on earth is represented there.

I have made these brief references to a few of our opponents simply to show a few of the kinds of attack to which we are subjected, and to prove that these men know nothing of what they are talking about. They are like the skeptic who attempts to measure the infinite by the finite, and who, because the puny mind of man can not compass or comprehend an overruling power, disbelieves everything. To him a view of the universe proves nothing, the fulfillment of the prophecies nothing. He doubts and disbelieves to show his own wisdom, and spreads his heresies regardless of pernicious effects.

There is another and larger class of persons whose utterances we find recorded in the proceedings of the American Banking Association, men of intelligence and prominence in financial circles, but whose supreme arrogance is astounding.

When we examine the utterances of these gentlemen we find that they propose to constitute themselves not only the legislators—the makers of the law—but the judiciary also, for they must be the sole interpreters of it. An act of Congress relating to the money question is in their eyes inevitably crude, undigested, and both pernicious and impracticable. They affect to think that if we want a wisely framed and an absolutely just law we must go to them for it, they being the true source or the exclusive custodians or the masters of all sound political economy. And, too, in case there should be any doubt as to the meaning of any act of Congress relating to monetary prospects, they alone are the burning and shining lights who can surely interpret it. The judgments of the highest tribunal in the land are only a rush-light compared with the pharos which gleams from their watch-tower. Or they are the perfect polished hyperbola which catches all true rays and sends them over a darkened land. And they are the patriots and soldiers who saved their country during its greatest perils. They were the real Grants and Shermans, Sheridans and Logans of the war.

But just here it should be noted that in saving the Union they saved their dollars also and carefully multiplied them. They sedulously utilized to their own advantage the pressing distresses of the Government, and have laid the foundations by the absorption of the powers referred to of a plutocracy which threatens the existence of our Government.

History and our common experience are fruitful of examples of compelled surrender by wealth and power, when concession to reasonable demands would have accomplished all that surrender finally yielded. Maladministration by preceding rulers of his line brought a king of France and thousands of the ruling class of that country to cruel death. A predecessor had selfishly stated the logic of his own maladministration and prophesied the destruction of his lineal heir to power when he said, "After us the deluge."

Congress may adjourn questions of serious moment to national want and promote a deluge of disaster to public interest. In recent years legislation and administration have taken little cognizance of popular opportunity for indemnity. The dalliance of power intrenched within the muniments of capital and legalized privilege gives it little leisure to discuss the educated opinion that regulates the action of the Government in all its functions, the government of the only country in the world controlled by public opinion.

Public necessities regulate that public opinion and asserts itself with omnipotent decree at the ballot-box. "Nero fiddling while Rome was burning" was the prototype of legislation in all countries where the necessities of the struggling masses are ignored. Power and capital are unhappily synonymous in America now, and no matter how splendidly endowed, they are capable of blunders resulting in enduring disaster to themselves. Such blunders are as frequent in politics and in public administration as are mistakes in war such as are memorable in the history of the greatest conquerors.

Napoleon's defeat in Russia was prefaced by his defeat in Spain. Had he not attempted to conquer Spain there would have been no occasion for his attempt on Russia, where he met the decree of his ruin. Privilege sanctified by law is not beyond the power of remedial legislation. The wants of the people are rarely unreasonable, and therefore rarely indefensible. They are inseparable from healthful government in our country at least.

Influences dominating public development often misunderstand the terms of their prerogative, especially when that prerogative asserts itself injudiciously to the public good.

England rules the financial markets of America, and no stronger statement can be made of the wrong done to the masses of our country than the incontestible fact of London's supremacy over all American centers of commerce in the determination of values.

The nation that to-day confronts immediate organic change from decaying remnants of feudalism by reason of the demands of its suffering multitudes controls American values of American productions. The or nation, perhaps a better characterization of England would be the organized system of spoliation upon weak nationalities which has created the British Empire, formulates American policy as to commerce and finance. The country that has denied community independence to Ireland for seven hundred years, and that vainly resisted American independence, fights the domestic happiness of our people and wars upon American hearthstones as cruelly as when it fought our desire to be a free people. It fomented our discords before our civil strife began. It leaned either way in avowed sympathy with the warring sections of our country as success seemed to promise to either.

We have a great country, and that it exists in its opportunities for popular development is due to no possible effort of England's diplomacy or England's money to crush it in its inception. But it is less to assail British influence in American legislation and administrative policy that ought now to employ us than the assertion of American ideas. What England needs in commerce and finance America does not need. What England recommends to America, America had better reject. English policy has been selfish for centuries, and has never favored the development of this country. It has been consistent in its regard for strictly English interests. Can we not have an American policy?

With a country illustrating for the first time in human history the capacity of the people to rule a government of their own creation, we can at least assert our independence of a power, which first sought to destroy our independence and which now aims its constant blows at all interests that would promote the happiness of our people. Our later financial legislation has not always held in view the greatest good to the greatest number. It has been for classes rather than for masses. It has been over loyal to the money centers and less than just to our great and growing industries. It has placed individual interest above the national interest, and has served the counting-room rather than the fields and the factories.

The cunning of capital has been more potent than the unorganized right of labor. Bonds have ruled where bondage has appealed in vain. The national debt which destroyed black slavery has substituted a white slavery which has more of pathos and tragedy in it than the institution which went down in the bitterness and terror of war. Out of this condition of affairs has grown the new "irrepressible conflict," in which brain and brawn are fighting for their equivalent in bread. It will not do to ignore the situation. It will not be wise to pass it by with a supercilious sneer. The labor agitations in the Republic to-day prove beyond peradventure that there is something wrong. Political economists with personal ends to serve may build fine theories to the contrary, but the practical illustrations of hundreds of thousands of men out of employment, with hundreds of thousands more laboring at wages scarcely sufficient to link life and toil, overthrow their logical houses of cards. The legislation which has allowed us to drift into this industrial slough of despond must contain a serious and radical error, and it is the part of wisdom to study where the error lies and to correct it. You can not convince a hungry man, who is anxious to work but can not obtain it, that his hunger is all right because it is in harmony with existing financial methods. The greatest political economy is that which keeps a toiler's stomach supplied.

It is superior to any set of resolutions ever passed by any clearing-house. The policy of England is a policy of special privileges, and its financial legislation teaches us nothing but the negative lesson of avoidance.

The selfish interests of cent per cent make poor inspirations for the monetary course of a republic. We are big enough to issue a declaration of financial independence. We are strong enough to again link silver and gold on equal terms in the brotherhood they maintained for centuries. Classism is as bad as communism. The broad highway of justice to all passes between the two. There must the Republic be found if it is to endure. Antony lingered in dalliance soft with the star-eyed Egyptian queen, and lost Actium at the hands of the second Cæsar. Cæsar, in the plenitude of an almost invincible military and civic power, said, scornfully, "the ides of March have come." When they had passed he lay at the foot of Pompey's statue. Louis XVI, playing at locksmith on the day that Paris was in the first wild turmoil of the impending revolution, wrote in his diary, "Nothing particular happened to-day." The only thing that had happened had been the destruction of the foundation-stone of the monarchy. Charles I, with a contempt for the people and a supreme confidence in the divinity that doth hedge about a king, asked, scornfully, "What can these Roundheads do?" He learned later they could cut off his head. Marie Antoinette, when told that the fish-wives were revolting because they had no bread, cried, with uplifted brows and wondering eyes in the confused ignorance that had never known a want ungratified, "Then why don't they eat cake?" History is full of these flippancies in the shadows of great crises. No element in this Republic, whose foundations are the legitimate wants of the people, dare be guilty of supercilious impertinence toward a demand which rises out of the distress of the masses.

If there are hungry men in a land of plenty there is a wrong beneath the hunger. If toil looks from its desolate cottage upon the dust-covered wheels of silent factories there is an injustice of law or of individual power. The clogged wheels are themselves an evidence that there is an error of political economy somewhere.

Let us learn wisdom from what has gone before. To be oblivious now of dangers fast approaching is unpardonable.

The cry of distress, the wail of despair, the ominous murmuring and howling clamor which come to us from wretched millions beyond the sea and find their echo here, faint as yet, admonish us to put our own house in order instead of wasting platitudes about the tottering thrones of Europe, which, if they do fall, will shake the world. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No signs of approbation or disapprobation will be allowed in the galleries.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, it becomes my painful duty to inform you of the death of my colleague, General JOHN F. MILLER, who departed this life this afternoon at twenty minutes past 2 o'clock, after a long and severe illness. I move that the Senate, out of respect to his memory, adjourn.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I rise to second the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the Senate, in respect to the memory of our colleague, who has recently died, do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 8, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday and Saturday were read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF MEMBER-ELECT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the credentials of a member-elect.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

To the honorable the House of Representatives:

I, Ernest G. Timme, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that Thomas R. Hudd was, on Tuesday, the 23d day of February, A. D. 1886, duly elected a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress of the United States, for the fifth Congressional district of the State of Wisconsin, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, as appears from the official canvass of votes given at a special election held in the fifth Congressional district of the State of Wisconsin on the day and year above written, and that he was so elected in accordance with the laws of the State of Wisconsin.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 5th day of March, A. D. 1886.

[SEAL.]

Mr. HUDD appeared and qualified by taking the prescribed oath.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MARTIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. PHELPS, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CABELL, for five days from to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. My attention has been called to an article which appeared in the Indianapolis Journal, and is reproduced in the Commercial Telegram of Toledo, Ohio, which makes reflections upon me, as I believe, in my representative capacity. I send the article to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read the extracts which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Washington correspondence Indianapolis Journal.]

The case of Maj. Lewis Merrill, of the Army, presents one of the most flagrant instances of confederate prosecution that has occurred since the advent of this administration, and one that will warm the blood of every gallant man who fought for the Union when the outrage is understood. During the past two or three weeks a great deal of fragmentary comment has been written on this case, but not sufficient connection has been given to it all to make it fully understood.

A short time ago there arrived at the Senate, among other Army nominations, that of Maj. Lewis Merrill to be lieutenant-colonel. The nomination was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and at the end of a few days, when it was expected to reappear in the Senate for confirmation, it was announced that the President had withdrawn the nomination.

About this time a dispatch appeared in a New York paper from New Orleans, announcing that Representative Blanchard had telegraphed from this city that he had succeeded in having the nomination of "Dog" Merrill withdrawn, and that he would not receive his promotion, which would be good news to Louisianians. Behind all of this is an interesting story.

When the war broke out again in Louisiana, in 1874, General Phil. Sheridan was sent to New Orleans to command the United States troops. The moment he reached his destination he saw the situation was alarming. Not only were many soldiers needed, but brave and cool-headed officers. An officer to take charge of the fighting was needed—a man full of manhood, courage, and good military experience was needed. Major Merrill was sent for and the war was ended, but not until some shooting was indulged in and the jails and station-houses were full of prisoners. Among the latter was Mr. BLANCHARD, the Congressman, who, a few days ago, telegraphed his friends that "Dog" Merrill had been defeated for promotion, and suggesting that it was a matter of congratulation for the people of Louisiana. BLANCHARD was arrested and imprisoned at the order of Merrill, and has been "laying for" the latter ever since.

As soon as Representative BLANCHARD saw the nomination of Major Merrill he rushed to Secretary Endicott and laid bare his grievance. He told him how Merrill had played havoc with the ku-klux in the Carolinas, and how he had invaded Louisiana with Phil. Sheridan and arrested "good citizens" engaged in a friendly riot—even going so far as to arrest the speaker. And in the name of the unreconstructed rebel element and revenge Mr. BLANCHARD demanded the withdrawal of the nomination. As Mr. Endicott is truckling to this element and is in sympathy with it, he immediately acceded to the request. Not a moment did he pause. It was enough that the confederates wanted it done. Hastening to the President, Mr. Endicott asked for the withdrawal of the nomination. Without asking for reasons the President made the order, the nomination was withdrawn, and now Mr. BLANCHARD, Mr. Endicott, and the various Messrs. Ku-klux, confederates, and "nigger-beaters" of the South have dangling at their belt, in the name of riot, treason, blood, and revenge, the scalp of Maj. Lewis Merrill, the hero of many bloody battles, who, riddled with bullets and worn by decades of gallant service, has been declared unfit for the service of an active soldier.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana stated when he rose that he desired to present a question of personal privilege. If any point is made as to that by the gentleman from Illinois the Chair will hear him upon it.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the gentleman speaking by unanimous consent; but I do not think a question of personal privilege is presented.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Then I ask the indulgence of the House to make a statement two minutes in length simply in denial of what has been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation not to exceed two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, that is a beautifully constructed, carefully arranged, and ingeniously contrived bloody-shirt and ku-klux-outrage story. The correspondent who concocted it is certainly a genius in his way. It seems a pity, sir, to spoil so harrowing a tale, one replete with political thunder, the rumblings of which promised so much for the fall election. But, sir, the inexorable logic of cold facts impels me to its destruction.

There is not one word of truth from beginning to end in that statement as contained in the extracts read by the Clerk.

The war did not begin over again in Louisiana in 1874. I was not taking an active part in politics in Louisiana at that time. I never was arrested by Major Merrill or on his order. I had nothing whatever to do with the withdrawal of his nomination before the Senate when it was sent there by the President for promotion to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. I did not send any telegram to Louisiana or elsewhere on the subject. I never at any time approached the Secretary of War or the President of the United States on that subject. I did not even know that the nomination of Major Merrill had been sent to the Senate until I saw by the press of the country his name had been withdrawn. I have no doubt the President of the United States had good and sufficient reasons for the withdrawal of the nomination, but I had nothing whatever to do with it. Mr. Speaker, while I believe the conduct of Major Merrill in Louisiana in 1874 was in a high degree censurable, I am not amenable to the charge of trying to prevent him from obtaining promotion in the Army because of it.

I have said this much, sir, in justice to myself, but more particularly in vindication of the President and Secretary of War from the charges and insinuations contained in the article read by the Clerk.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal on Saturday I may call up resolutions relating to the death of my former colleague, Mr. RANKIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House will take up for consideration resolutions in relation to the death of his former colleague, Mr. RANKIN. Is there objection?

Mr. BEACH. Let the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. It is a request in relation to fixing a time for the consideration of resolutions in regard to the death of the gentleman's former colleague, Mr. RANKIN.

Mr. BEACH. Let the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. There is no resolution here. It is a request.

Mr. BEACH. When that resolution is up for consideration I desire to make a few remarks upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman requests that an order be made to consider the resolutions next Saturday, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BEACH. Is it a motion setting apart next Saturday for that purpose?

Mr. BRAGG. I withdraw my application.

Mr. BEACH. I do not wish to put myself in the position of objecting—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The application is withdrawn.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair discovers from the reading of the Journal that the previous question was ordered on the passage of a bill at the evening session of the House on last Friday. Under the rules and practice of the House that bill comes up now for consideration—

A bill (H. R. 2022) to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell, widow of Maj. William G. Mitchell, assistant adjutant-general United States Army, brevet colonel and brigadier-general, to $50 per month.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, what debate are we entitled to upon this bill?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, if there was no debate before the previous question was ordered, there will be thirty minutes for debate this morning, fifteen minutes in support of the bill and fifteen in opposition to it. The Chair understands that this bill was reported adversely by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does this bill come over from Friday evening last?

The SPEAKER. The Journal, as read this morning, shows that by unanimous consent at the session of the House on Friday evening last the previous question was ordered not only upon engrossing the bill and ordering it to a third reading, but also upon its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. Can a bill come over from a Friday evening session in that way?

The SPEAKER. The universal custom of the House has been that when the previous question is ordered on the passage of a bill it comes up after the reading of the Journal on the next day the House is in session.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that rule applies to business of a general nature; but should not private bills go over until the day when such business is specially in order?

The SPEAKER. The practice has been always applied to private as well as public bills when the previous question has been ordered on their passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, was it in order to move the previous question upon the passage of the bill before the question has been taken on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. It was not in order, but the Journal shows that it was done by unanimous consent, which of course would dispense with the rule of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it very extraordinary that unanimous consent should be given at an evening session of that kind to anything which would control the business of the House in this way. Members generally do not expect or understand that business is to come over by unanimous consent from any evening session of that character. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report is in the nature of debate, and therefore it will come out of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report be read, and that the time be not taken out of the time of either side. The report is very brief.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I will read the report myself; it is only a few lines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. In order that this bill and its condition as it comes before the House to-day may be fully understood, I would state that a week ago last Friday night it was almost at the head of the Calendar for consideration on Friday evening. There being but a limited number of members present at the Friday evening session, and as the report from the committee was adverse, I did not desire to antagonize the legislation that followed in natural sequence the standing of this bill. Therefore, with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the bill went over, and again, by unanimous consent, on last Friday night, the same condition of affairs existing, it went over, and has its standing this morning in the House as has been stated. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has made this report upon the bill:

The bill proposes to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell, widow of Maj. G. Mitchell, from $25 to $50 per month. There is no question in the minds of your committee as to the meritorious services of Major Mitchell, but it has hitherto been the rule of the committee to confine the action proposed by the bill rigidly within the line of general officers. Your committee ask, therefore, to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it lie upon the table.

Mr. Speaker, I take no exception to the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I can well understand that in the multitude of bills with which they have to deal they should fix positive rules whereby to determine the legislation which they consider should be presented to this House on Friday evenings, when but a limited body of the membership of the House is present. The bills that come before us at the Friday evening sessions are, as a rule, reported unanimously from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I desire to thank that committee for placing this bill so satisfactorily under the binding obligation of their rule before this House for its consideration. "There is no question in the minds of your committee as to the meritorious services of Major Mitchell, but it has hitherto been the rule of the committee to confine the action proposed in the bill rigidly within the line of general officers." The action of the committee has been consistent in its recommendations that no widow of any officer in the service of less grade than that of a general officer in full commission shall receive a pension larger than the general statute admits. I desire to submit to this House Mrs. Mitchell's letter of appeal to the committee. She writes:

Kindly permit me to make the following statement in the matter of my application now before Congress for increase of pension. My entire income, in addition to the pension of $25 per month allowed me by law, is the interest on a small life insurance. I have not only myself to provide for, but three boys, so young as to be entirely dependent upon my efforts for support and education. I have tried faithfully to obtain employment, but up to this time have utterly failed to do so. I therefore pray, in view of my husband's long and valuable services and my children's necessity, as well as my own, that my application for relief may find favorable consideration at your hands.

Mr. LONG. How much does she now receive?

Mr. BINGHAM. Twenty-five dollars per month. Mr. Speaker, this officer, Major Mitchell, having carried on the 18th day of April, 1861, the first flag that passed though the city of Baltimore borne by Pennsylvania troops, remained in the service throughout all the war, and until his death, about a year since, upon the staff of Major-General Hancock. Throughout the entire war honor, distinction, and commission were offered to him, but to every offer of higher commission he said, "No, my field of usefulness and my place is on the staff of my commanding general;" and while higher commands and great distinction could have been won by him, he steadily refused higher commission and remained in this position from the beginning of the war to its end, participating in twenty-four battles, and declining every distinction or promotion because he felt that his services were more valuable in the confidential relation he held to General Hancock than they could be in any other rank which the National Government could give him. General Hancock, under date January 26, thus writes to Mr. SWOPE, of Pennsylvania, who has had this bill in charge:

Will you allow me to take up enough of your time to explain the reasons which induce me to feel a very great personal interest in a bill that has been introduced in Congress for the benefit of Mrs. Ellen M. Mitchell. Mrs. Mitchell is the widow of General William G. Mitchell who was the senior aid on my staff both during the late war and for some years afterward. He was a brevet colonel in the regular Army, a brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, and, at the time of his death in 1883, was an assistant adjutant-general in the Army with the rank of major. The actual rank he held, however, was by no means indicative of the valuable services he rendered, and had he not been confined to the somewhat narrow sphere of a staff position, there is no telling to what distinction of rank his splendid military talents combined with his personal bravery and devotion to duty might have led him.

As it was he frequently had command of troops and led them into action with important successful results, and his gallant services made his name conspicuous in many of the official reports of the battles in which I was engaged.

Now, his widow being in somewhat straightened circumstances, General Mitchell's friends are anxious to secure the passage of the bill which proposes to increase her pension to $50 a month. I need hardly to remind you that many such bills have passed Congress, and some of them last session, with little or no opposition. Few of them, however, were as meritorious as this, which for many other reasons besides those I have named, deserves to be considered as involving most exceptional merit.

May I hope that you will bear the matter in mind, and that you will assist in securing favorable action upon it, both in the committee and House? (The House bill is No. 2022, and was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.)

There are a number of gentlemen in Congress who knew General Mitchell, but as I can not recall their names now I would refer chiefly to Gen. H. H. Bingham, of Pennsylvania, who was also on my staff during the war and could speak from personal knowledge of General Mitchell.

I might add, in conclusion, that General Mitchell was the color-bearer of a Pennsylvania regiment of emergency troops that marched through Baltimore, April 18, 1861, and from what I saw of the abilities and talents he displayed I selected him at once for my aid.

I am, very truly, yours,

WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

P. S.—I send herewith a marked copy of my official report of the battle of Boydton Road, showing conspicuous services of General Mitchell in leading troops into action.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to that report to quote only one passage, without going into details:

I have had occasion to acknowledge the services of Major Mitchell in every action in which I have been engaged during the war.

I will now read a letter addressed by General Hancock to myself some time ago:

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK, December 13, 1884.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I do not know what may be possible in connection with Mrs. Mitchell's aspirations for an increased pension, according to the way in which you and I and other friends would like to place the matter.

It is not necessary to press your judgment in this matter; you know the facts.

I send to you some newspaper extracts showing what I presume to be the accurate status of similar cases before Congress at the close of last session. You and I are very well aware that General Mitchell is entitled to a great deal more than a technical consideration, in a comparison between himself and others of equal rank, in consequence of his extraordinary services on the field of battle and in various ways since the war.

It might seem to persons not knowing the circumstances as you and I know them, and to those not having had the same opportunity of judgment, that such comparison is not worthy of consideration. We know the contrary.

He was a devoted officer, as you know. His services not only in the war of the rebellion, but since in Indian wars and in the performance of other important duties, if duly presented, should invite the kindly and just attention of Congress.

I may mention his Indian service on the Western frontier under Generals Schofield, Pope, myself, and others; his public duties in Louisiana and Texas when I was commanding in the fifth military district, and always afterward under the eyes or supervision of all the important officers of the Army of whatever grade, winning the esteem and respect of all.

I never knew that he had an enemy, and he had hosts of friends on account of the appreciation of his gallantry, ability, services, and character.

He entered the military service in the emergency of the earliest part of the war as a private, winning his distinction and promotion through his abilities and great character.

I might say to you that he would have won much higher rank but for his close connection with me, which can be readily understood in the sequence of events, although he was in no way identified with politics in a partisan way, he being too liberal-minded for that, no matter with whom associated.

If you will place this matter on record in its proper light so that the claim of his widow and children may be appropriately considered, I can ask of you no more, and it is a duty that you and I owe to the knowledge of his services, ability, and character that such efforts should be made.

I trust that you will give this matter your attention so that his widow and children may receive all the benefit to which they are entitled.

I am, very truly, yours,

WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

General H. H. BINGHAM,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Speaker, whatever time may remain I desire to reserve after making a single statement. Having served upon the staff of that distinguished officer Hancock from the commencement to the end of the war, I can make to this House the unqualified declaration that I never in the field of action saw a braver or more brilliant soldier, and never in the councils of a general was more wisdom and ability displayed than by General Mitchell. I will conclude by reminding the House of the fact that higher honor, higher position, was frequently within General Mitchell's grasp, but upon every occasion he stated, "My desire is to remain upon the staff of General Hancock, where I feel my services will be more valuable to my country."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker ——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. If the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] desires to say anything, I will give way.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I do not propose to give the history of this bill (for that has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and need not be repeated), except to say that the bill was reported in the first instance by the Committee on Invalid Pensions unanimously with an adverse report. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has adhered to the rule that the pensions of officers and their widows ought not to be increased except so far as concerns the widows of general officers.

That is a rule not established by this Congress, but established long ago; and we have yielded reluctantly to that, because so many pensions of widows of general officers have been increased that we have been unable to refuse the later applications of that kind without saying to these widows, "Your husbands were not as worthy as the other general officers whose widows have had their pensions increased." For that reason we have yielded to the precedent; but we have stood right there and have refused to go any further; and in deciding this question it should be remembered that whenever you establish a precedent of this kind you open the gate in all similar cases. If this widow is to have $50 a month, there are tens of thousands of widows who ought to have the same pension.

Now, I am not going to discuss the question whether the widow of any general officer ought to have $50 a month or not; for neither I nor any one in this Congress is responsible for that. The allowance of $50 a month in such cases was begun a great many years ago. But whenever you start to pension at $50 a month the widows of those below that grade you open a very wide door. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has said there are some precedents; they are very scarce.

Mr. BINGHAM. There were three, I think, in the last Congress.

Mr. MATSON. Not more than three or four; and it is time that this Congress should stop at the line we have been attempting to draw. Why, sir, at one of our Friday-night meetings recently the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], in a very eloquent and brilliant speech, asked that the pension of a private soldier's widow be increased to $24 per month. It was a difficult thing to resist that appeal, because this private soldier had received the thanks of Congress for a very conspicuous act of gallantry. But when the members then present came to consider that the widows of other men who left their homes and their wives and sacrificed their lives for their country were receiving only $8 a month, it was determined, I think almost unanimously, that it would be wrong to select this widow who had married since the war and give her $24 a month.

Thus great injustice must always be done whenever you attempt to select one among a large number of very deserving people and say that one shall receive more than the rest. Though every word that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has said in relation to General Mitchell is true, nobody questions that, we have been obliged to stand here and ask this House to help us stop at the point where Congress has heretofore said we should stop. Why, sir, the precedents are almost unanimous for the refusal of this application; there are only two or three precedents on the other side; not more than half a dozen, I apprehend, altogether.

Mr. BINGHAM. There were three in the last Congress.

Mr. MATSON. There were two or three in the last Congress. I remember very well, and so does my friend from Pennsylvania perhaps, how those bills were passed. It is a question merely of favoritism; that is all there is of it.

It is a question of favoritism. I know, and so does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of many other gallant soldiers whose widows are more needy than the one whose claim he urges to-day with so much ability. They are to remain at $17 and $25 per month, and yet he wishes to have her pension increased to $50 per month. It is not right. The proper thing is to do justice to all as nearly as we can, and not select out one of a large number and say she shall receive a higher pension than all the rest.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. MATSON. I will yield then four minutes of that time to my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. PETERS. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] proceeds I should like to ask his colleague a question.

Mr. MATSON. What is it?

Mr. PETERS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana this question: I believe there were two or three instances during the last session of Congress of applications of a similar nature to the one now pending; but I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions state to this House if there were not a number of cases similar to this in which this House refused to make the increase asked for?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir; quite a large number.

Mr. PETERS. I recollect one, of a colonel who fell fighting at the head of his regiment, where application was made to place his widow on the roll at a higher rate than the law granted in similar cases, and it was declined.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has yielded to his colleague for four minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to granting pensions at the proper rate provided by the law in deserving cases. The argument made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is that this presents an exceptional case. He tells us here is an officer of the regular Army who did gallant service on the staff of General Hancock. Let us concede, for the sake of argument, that all he has claimed is true, and yet General Mitchell did nothing more than his simple duty.

The widow in her letter says she has three sons. That may be true, but there are thousands of other widows in the country who have three sons whose husbands fell gallantly fighting upon the field of battle for their country, and I assume the sons of this widow and this officer are no more deserving than the sons of other widows and gallant officers who lost their lives in the war.

Because this man was in the regular Army I am opposed to selecting out the case of his widow and paying her a pension so much larger than is provided for under the law for similar cases so she may live and support her sons in elegance, while the sons of private soldiers must make their way by the sweat of their brow and get their education and support their widowed mothers as best they may. The principle is wrong in every way. An officer of the regular Army who receives good pay should in time of peace lay up a competency for his widow and children who survive him. If he should fail to do so, it is not right for Congress to step in and provide a pension so much greater than is allowed by law in similar cases so she and her sons may live in a better style than the widows of officers of the same rank whose husbands have done their duty as faithfully and gallantly.

A MEMBER. Why, she draws a pension of $25 a month now.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes; she now draws a pension of $25 a month, which is the proper pension of the rank of her husband. That being true, it is wrong for Congress to give her more because her husband happened to be an officer in the regular Army. It will tend necessarily to engender in the Army a disposition to extravagance and toward aristocracy, which should not exist in this free Government of ours. Let the regular Army officers understand in time of peace they must lay up something for the support of their families and not be under the belief by such legislation as is proposed that when they die Congress will provide handsome pensions for their widows and children, giving them four or five times as much pension as to the widows of other officers who fell in battle. I think these reasons are sufficient to demonstrate to us this bill is one of those which ought not to pass.

Mr. MATSON. I will yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, for one I have no special objection to the passage of any bill which proposes to do justice to the widow of a soldier who has fallen in the line of duty. The Government can not do less than grant a reasonable pension to the widows and orphan children of its fallen soldiers. No government on earth ever has been more liberal in the way of granting pensions than this Government has to the widows and orphans of its fallen brave. Under the law now the beneficiary of this bill draws $25 a month, which is the amount of pension allowed to the widow of an officer of the grade of General Mitchell. It is no more than enough, but I find no fault with the law which grants that amount of pension.

But I am opposed to the passage of this bill for the reasons given as well by the gentleman from Indiana on this as by the gentleman from Indiana on the other side of the House. An officer holds his position in the Army of his own free will, accepting the emoluments attached to it during life which the law provides. There is nothing to force or compel him to retain that place, but he does it voluntarily, and the Government pays him according to his rank while he lives. When he dies what is he? Simply a dead soldier. The private soldier or the subaltern officer who goes upon the field and does his whole duty does just as much as this officer and nothing more. One can not do more than his whole duty, nor can any true soldier do less; and no soldier is entitled to credit for doing his duty, nor should he be compensated or his widow be compensated if he leaves one, over the widows and orphans of other soldiers who did their whole duty.

Mr. Speaker, take the case of a man who belonged to my own command, and fell shot through the brain at the battle of Franklin; as brave and gallant a soldier as ever marched to battle beneath the starry banner; a man who stood in the front line, and with his brain penetrated by a ball fell dead at my feet. He left a widow and five children, all small, the youngest a babe in arms. That widow wept over the prostrate form of the gallant soldier, the help, the stay, and the hope of herself and children, and to-day she is drawing a pension of $8 a month for the support of herself and these five little ones—not $25 a month as does the widow of this dead officer. Mr. Speaker, death levels all ranks. They both lie wrapped in their martial cloaks, dead heroes, whether they fought with stars and eagles on their shoulders or whether they wore chevrons or the plain uniform of a common soldier. And the Government should deal with the widow not as it deals with the officer during his lifetime, but as so many charges the Government is in honor and gratitude bound to care for, each having the same claim upon its bounty, and not say that in one special case this widow shall be singled out from the great body of pensioners and paid more than the others because her husband served on the staff of General Hancock.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Speaker, there has been in the whole history of the country no more deserving or meritorious case presented to Congress than this. It is not true, as gentlemen have argued, that the object of this is to create an aristocracy either in the Pension Bureau or in the Army. This man refused promotion believing that he could do his country more service by remaining in the comparatively humble position he occupied than in accepting the promotion to which he was entitled. Surely if you reward virtue, if you reward those who do good, and that is the only reason for giving general officers' widows a higher pension than you give to the widow of a common soldier, this lady should receive the pension that this bill proposes to give her; that is to say, the pension that is accorded to the widow of a general officer, because her husband did the work of a general officer and more than a general officer. Many major-generals never did as much as he, and their widows are not entitled to more than his. They who do much for the country deserve much at the country's hands.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON], who made the declaration in the course of his remarks as to the question of aristocracy raised by this and similar cases, that there is no aristocracy to be feared when a woman and a lady can send to the Committee on Pensions a letter from which I read this single extract:

I have tried faithfully to obtain employment, but up to this time have utterly failed to do so.

And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], let me say I could not help feeling that his speech a moment ago was not a true echo of the speech I heard him make in the last Congress when the distinguished, the great, and never to be paid for services of Major-General Thomas were under consideration, a bill at that time being before the House to give his widow $2,000 per annum. The gentleman's declarations and utterances then were very different from what they are now, and I desire only to refer to that case and the case of Mrs. Admiral Farragut to show that when a question comes before Congress in a full body the nice distinctions that the general law applies do not always prevail in the final action on such measures.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Let me interrupt the gentleman a moment. I desire simply to call his attention to the fact that I made no speech on the bill he refers to.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman did not?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I did not.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I will stand corrected; but the gentleman voted for the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. I have done many foolish things no doubt in my life, but that is not among the number.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought that the gentleman had advocated the passage of that bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not. I was opposed to the principle embodied in the bill then and now.

Mr. BINGHAM. For a moment longer, Mr. Speaker. I desire to say simply that I put this question before the House on the ground of the specially distinguished and distinctive services of this gallant officer. It rests there and there only, and there I desire the vote may be taken in this House. I hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 98.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, 31 members voting therefor and 128 in opposition; not one-fifth in the affirmative.

So the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. MATSON. If necessary, I shall ask that the bill be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. This vote disposes of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail, in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PROTESTS AGAINST TARIFF CHANGES.

Mr. McKINLEY, by unanimous consent, presented the following; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and, by unanimous consent, ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names:

Mr. Speaker and members of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: In presenting to your honorable body volume No. 3 of Protests against Tariff Reduction, I would respectfully state that this volume contains the original signatures of leading manufacturers from twenty-seven States of the Union who take this method of recording their protest against any reduction of the tariff.

The industrial establishments represented in the three volumes which I have had the honor of presenting to Congress give employment to one hundred and twenty-nine thousand workmen, who, at an average of only $7 per week, receive $46,956,000 per annum in wages.

It is believed that the proposed tariff bill will have the effect of reducing the wages of a greater portion of these one hundred and twenty-nine thousand workmen fully 25 per cent., a reduction of more than ten millions annually in the wages of these people.

In submitting this volume of protests for your consideration I beg to repeat that each person, firm, or corporation signing these protests solemnly assures Congress that labor will be compelled to bear a large share of any reduction of duties, and every business man whose signature appears in either volume emphasizes his opposition to any legislation which tends to reduce American labor to the foreign standard either in price or condition.

These three volumes represent the views of leading manufacturers upon this subject from thirty-four States of the Union.

With assurance of the highest esteem, please believe me,

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN W. FRAZIER.

PHILADELPHIA, March, 1886.

Protest against tariff revision.

To the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: Believing that any reduction of the tariff would be detrimental to the welfare of the people of this nation, the business men of the United States respectfully record their protest against any scaling down of duties, for the reasons stated generally in the minority report of the Ways and Means Committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, to wit:

"First. That not a single interest, excepting the free-trade clubs of New York and Brooklyn, desires a reduction of the tariff. Neither the manufacturer, the miner, the farmer, the laborer, or the consumer has requested or demanded any such reduction; on the contrary, every interest, manufacturing, laboring, and agricultural, protests most earnestly against cutting down the duties on imported goods.

"Second. It will disturb business (the discussion of it has already done this), it will unsettle values, retard incipient enterprises, cripple those now established, impair confidence among business men, so essential to our development and prosperity, and will bring no countervailing benefits.

"Third. It will of necessity force down the price of labor in the United States, it will stimulate imports, increase competition from abroad, which can only be successfully met by reducing the cost of home manufacture.

"The testimony is uniform, and not contradicted, that labor will be compelled to bear a large share of the reduction. Wr. William Weihe, the president of the largest labor organization in the country, said in his statement before the Committee on Ways and Means, "that any reduction of the duties would reduce the price of labor generally." We can not, therefore, too strongly emphasize our opposition to any legislation which tends to reduce American labor to the foreign standard, either in price or condition. The maintenance of a fair and adequate scale of wages for American workmen is indispensable to their comfort, their well-being, and the education of their families; is essential to the good order of society, the stability of our institutions, and the welfare and progress of our country.

"Fourth. It is wholly unnecessary, unjustifiable, and in every respect, and to every American interest, only hurtful. The enormous increase of the capital wealth of the country during the last fifteen years, under a protective tariff, now forces capital to seek employment in the development of all mineral, agricultural, and other resources to the gain and advantage of all our people, and a change or modification of the system will create such doubt of successful enterprise as to check this useful tendency and to thwart the national development, the progress of which is without precedent in the civilized world.

"What the country wants most is relief from Congressional agitation of the tariff. All the industries of the country are extremely sensitive, and at this time, when business is more or less depressed in every branch, the declaration or fear of a change introduces an element of uncertainty and disturbance throughout the country, the evil effects of which no one can foresee."

For these and other reasons equally as strong, the business interests of the country are adverse to any reduction of the tariff, and herewith unite in recording their protest against a policy that they believe would result injuriously to all the people of the United States.

CHILDREN OF SURG. A. W. OWEN.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of the children of the late Surg. Alfred W. Owen and to increase their pensions; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY HOWARD FARQUHAR.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1201) for the relief of Mary Howard Farquhar; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH O. DRUMMOND.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2623) granting a pension to Sarah O. Drummond; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES WATERS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5074) to provide an increase of pension to James Waters; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH LEFFMAN.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5706) for the relief of Elizabeth Leffman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS UNDER EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. MCKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 410) to pay to the employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld in violation of the eight-hour law; and

A bill (H. R. 996) to provide for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

Mr. MCKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, also reported, as a substitute for House bills 410 and 996, a bill (H. R. 6660) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORLANDO B. WILLCOX.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1164) to complete the military record of Orlando B. Willcox, late colonel of the First Michigan Volunteer Infantry and brigadier-general of volunteers, and to give him pay in compliance with his completed record; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, ETC.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably a concurrent resolution of the Senate for printing the last annual report of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR AMERICAN LEGATIONS.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back favorably a joint resolution (H. Res. 129) directing the Public Printer to forward the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to our legations abroad; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING REPORTS OF UNITED STATES CONSULS.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back favorably a concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of the reports of United States consuls on cattle-breeding and dairy-farming; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HATCH offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That Rule XXXIV of the House of Representatives be amended by inserting in line 8, after the words "governors of States," the words "Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture."

SAMUEL BAKER.

Mr. BRADY, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 5061) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Baker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at four minutes past 3 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering House bill 5549, limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y.; and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to ten minutes after the reading of the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the report be read first, and then let unanimous consent be asked to limit debate.

The SPEAKER. The report can be read only in committee. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]?

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to examine the report, and possibly after it is read we may want more than ten minutes for debate.

Mr. DIBBLE. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] want?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]?

Mr. STORM. I must object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. For how long does the right of this committee to the floor continue this morning?

The SPEAKER. The committee will have the floor for one hour, unless the bill under consideration is concluded before that time. The committee can not call up any other bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I have made this request as to the limitation of debate solely in the interest of the dispatch of the public business, because this is the last bill that our committee can call up at this time.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLBORN. Do I understand the Chair to hold that in the event of the committee disposing of this bill during this hour they can not call up another bill this morning?

The SPEAKER. Yes. This is the second hour that this committee has occupied the floor.

The motion of Mr. DIBBLE was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y. The bill having been heretofore read in Committee of the Whole, the Clerk will now read the report.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the report shall be read in my time, provided I can have the floor afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5549:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1570) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building in Rochester, N. Y., respectfully reports:

That on the 7th day of August, 1882, an act was passed by the then Congress making an appropriation for the purchase of a site for a public building in Rochester, N. Y., of $150,000.

That the site was purchased, and subsequent appropriations by Congress aggregating $150,000 were made to erect the building thereon, which was thereafter commenced under plans and specifications made and approved by the Supervising Architect.

Owing to the law which forbids the letting of a contract for a public building at a sum exceeding the appropriation, the plans and specifications were drawn and made with reference to the limited sum appropriated, and the work had progressed at the commencement of this winter only to the top of the first story, when the progress of the work was suspended for the winter. The site affords ample ground room for the proposed enlargement.

Rochester is a city of over 100,000 inhabitants and rapidly growing. The post-office at present occupies rented quarters of insufficient capacity, and in area uses 6,687 square feet, while the working space in the proposed public building will be only 3,454 square feet, about one-half the present insufficient area.

The accommodations in the proposed new building for the other departments of the public service which must be provided for, namely, the custom-house, the internal-revenue offices, the Federal courts, and various offices relating thereto are wholly inadequate.

This state of things is chargeable solely to the existing laws, which compel the plan, specifications, and contracts all to be made with regard to amount of existing appropriations for the express purpose. The matter in a general way is tersely stated and the evils of the existing system vividly illustrated by the Supervising Architect in his able annual report for 1885, recently submitted to Congress.

It is evident to your committee that the original appropriation for the public building in Rochester, with its great and growing industries and rapidly increasing population, should have been not less than the amount asked for by this substitute bill.

The completion of said building without the suggested enlargement would be unwise in the extreme. The additional appropriation asked for should be promptly made, so as to enable the spring work to be commenced and carried on with reference thereto. This additional appropriation is approved by the Supervising Architect.

The accompanying petition, signed by a considerable number of the leading and wealthy citizens of Rochester, representing, as we are advised, the public sentiment in regard to the matters therein stated, is respectfully submitted as part of our report, also the accompanying communication from the Supervising Architect, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

We respectfully recommend the accompanying bill as a substitute for House bill 1570.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., January 4, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have read the subjoined petition and hereby certify to the correctness of the figures given therein.

Very respectfully,

OSCAR KNEBEL,
Supt. of Construction, U. S. C. H., P. O., &c.

Hon. CHARLES S. BAKER,
Washington, D. C.

ROCHESTER, January 4, 1886.

SIR: Inclosed please find the petition promised, together with the Architect's statements as to the dimensions of the present post-office and the new structure in process of erection. Hope your efforts will prove successful for a further appropriation of $300,000, as any one can see by a glance at the Architect's measurement that the present appropriation is entirely inadequate toward finishing a public building that is needed in this city.

Very respectfully,

B. M. BAKER.

Hon. CHARLES BAKER,
Washington, D. C.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, your petitioners, citizens of the city of Rochester, N. Y., respectfully represent that the public service, comprising the departments of the post-office, the custom-house, and revenue offices, the Federal courts and offices relating thereto, can not be accommodated in the public building, if erected and completed under the present plans or within the present appropriation; that the post-office, for instance, has now a working space of 6,687 square feet in Reynold's Arcade, and is inadequate to the needs of the city, with its population over 100,000, and rapidly increasing; but the working space in the proposed public building will be only 3,454 square feet, about one-half of the present insufficient area.

Your petitioners represent that the requisite enlargement of the building can be made on the present site, and is an imperative necessity.

Your petitioners therefore pray that the bill No. 1570, for an additional appropriation of $300,000, may be, as speedily as possible, advanced to become a law.

Burke, Geo. F. Danforth, James L. Angle, Geo. Raines, Thomas Rainey, William N. Sage, president of Municipal Reform League; Oscar Craig, M. Filon, N. P. Pond, H. O. Hathaway, Ellwanger & Berry, B. M. Baker, Henry E. Rochester, C. J. Hayden.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, January 23, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the limit of cost as now fixed for the new public building at Rochester, N. Y.

The act of May 25, 1882, limits the cost of the site and building to $300,000. The amount expended for the site was $75,630.43, leaving a balance of $224,370 as the cost of the building. The amount is now, and always was, totally inadequate to construct a building that would give sufficient accommodations to the Post-Office Department to properly transact its business at the present time without considering the question of future necessities.

After a careful examination of the space required, in which the postmaster of the city of Rochester has been consulted, I believe it to be the poorest economy to restrict the cost of the building to the present limit of cost. As the necessity for a new post-office building at Rochester is undisputed, and has been recognized by Congress, in my judgment the building should be so constructed as not only to meet the present necessities of the Government, but its future necessities, so that it will not have to be enlarged within a few years after its completion.

In this connection permit me to call your attention to the importance of fixing the limits of cost upon new public buildings with some relation to the necessities of the Government where the buildings are to be erected, as fully set forth in my two annual reports, so that plans may be prepared for a building that will intelligently provide accommodations when completed without embarrassing this office by early alterations and additions. I have therefore to recommend that Congress be asked to increase the limit of cost upon this building in accordance with the provisions of House bill No. 1570, with the amendment that the amount fixed in said bill as the limit of cost ($600,000) should include the approaches, heating apparatus, and elevators.

Respectfully, yours,

M. E. BELL,
Supervising Architect.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. EDEN rose.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the committe rise for the purpose of limiting debate to ten minutes, unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] desires more time.

Mr. EDEN. Say fifteen minutes.

Mr. DIBBLE. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois I ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill be limited to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, as the report has been read in the hearing of the Committee of the Whole, I do not know that I desire to make any extended remarks unless there should be some questions raised by gentlemen in opposition to the bill. I would like to hear what objection can be made, and would reserve my time for the purpose of replying to any remarks which may be made in opposition to the measure.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I understand I am entitled to one-half of the time—seven and a half minutes. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize any gentleman who desires to oppose this bill.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have not paid special attention to this bill; but it seems to be liable to this objection: A limit has already been fixed to the cost of this building—$300,000, I believe, was the amount originally limited—and now, while the building is in course of erection, as I understand, it is proposed to make an additional appropriation of $150,000.

Mr. DIBBLE and Mr. BAKER. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. EDEN. Then the sum of $200,000 is to be added to the amount originally limited. At the last Congress, if I am correctly informed, only $100,000 was asked for; but now we have an application for $200,000. The amount seems to grow every session, and this shows the evil of a system under which Congress fixes an amount as the limitation of cost and then increases the appropriation beyond the original limitation.

I know nothing as to the particular necessity of this building, but it seems to me that when the limitation of $300,000 was fixed it should have been known as well then as it can be now what sum would be required to complete the building. I approve of the remark made the other day by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds when he stated it was proposed that this evil should not exist in the future; that it is the intention of the committee not to report in favor of increasing the amounts originally provided for these purposes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That applies to original bills to be introduced.

Mr. EDEN. This was an original bill for an expenditure of $300,000 when first proposed here.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But not in this Congress.

Mr. EDEN. But this Congress ought not to be any more extravagant than the one which fixed the limit at $300,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. If the gentleman will permit, I will state in explanation of the point he has just made that this building is partly erected, and, according to the report of the Supervising Architect, the space afforded by the present plan is absolutely insufficient, so that the building, if finished for the $300,000, will not accommodate the wants of the Government. Hence we have felt bound to report in favor of such an appropriation as will prevent the necessity of erecting another building, which would be much more expensive than to enlarge this one while in process of erection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The question I desire to address to the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, is this: Did the bill, as originally passed, authorizing the construction of this building, contain the provision that the Secretary of the Treasury should not approve of any plan that involved a larger expenditure than the sum appropriated by the bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. That provision was not in the bill; it is a provision which has been adopted by us since as a matter of precaution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was inserted in many bills passed in the last Congress. I was not aware whether it was included in that bill or not.

Mr. BEACH. The original bill for this building was passed in the Forty-seventh Congress. I remember making a report on it myself.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the present bill is not a transgression of the principle which the House has laid down.

Mr. REAGAN. It is a transgression of this principle, that Congress in matters of this kind ought to determine the amount that is to be expended, and the executive officers or those employed by the Government ought not to go on and increase the expenditures without the authority of Congress—ought to plan a building within the appropriation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The later bills, as I understand, preclude any expenditure beyond the original appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will remember that the general law does not authorize the Treasury Department to proceed to erect a public building until the limit is fixed, and of course it was fixed by the former legislation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Allow me to say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the original appropriation for this building was made by the Forty-seventh Congress. It now appears by information from the Supervising Architect that the building when finished, unless we make a further appropriation, will not give more than one-half the space that is at present occupied in the building now used.

Mr. BAKER. And that is insufficient.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is insufficient. Now, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—and I think the House will agree with them—deem it imprudent and unwise to go on and complete a building which when finished will not be adequate for the purposes contemplated.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is quite true.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Therefore the limit of expenditure is increased in accordance with the recommendation of the Supervising Architect.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was the plan of the building deemed sufficient when the bill passed only a few years ago?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Inasmuch as I was not fortunate enough to be a member of the Forty-seventh Congress, I can not give the gentleman the information he desires on that point.

Mr. BEACH. I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio. The original bill for this building was introduced, if my recollection is correct, by Mr. Van Voorhis, then a Representative from the Rochester district. That bill, I believe, called for an appropriation of $500,000; but we cut it down in the committee to $300,000. Hence, I suppose, arises the present necessity of increasing the appropriation. The amount appropriated at that time was not deemed sufficient, as I remember.

Mr. HOLMAN. The statement in the report is that $150,000 was originally appropriated for the site; that only $75,000 was expended in the purchase of the ground; that subsequently an additional appropriation of $150,000 was made; and I suppose the act making this additional appropriation fixed the limit of cost of the site and building at $300,000. I presume that to have been the fact; and the circumstance that in the last Congress the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported in favor of $100,000 to construct the wing makes the fact now presented somewhat singular.

Mr. BAKER. I will now yield two minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read, in this connection, the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, made at the time of the original appropriation. It shows the necessity for the enlargement of this building in Rochester, as contemplated by the pending measure. The report was submitted by my colleague from New York [Mr. BEACH], and it is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1186) to provide for the erection of a building for the use of the Government of the United States as a post-office, court-house, marshal's office, custom-house, and internal-revenue office at Rochester, N. Y., beg leave to report:

That this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate and in the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress, but at so late a day that action could not be had thereon.

The city of Rochester is one of the largest and most flourishing cities in the State of New York. Outside of New York city and Brooklyn, it is the second city in size and in commercial importance in the State. Its population is estimated to be not less than 100,000.

The amount of revenue received at this place during the fiscal year of 1881 was $1,316,780.10.

The revenue collected at the Rochester post-office during the last year was $160,912.48. The money-orders paid and sold at this office during the last fiscal year amount to $726,987.59.

The post-office pays now an annual rent of $3,500 for its accommodations. It is located in a wooden building, and in case of fire nothing could save the office or its contents. There are twenty clerks and twenty-five letter-carriers employed in this office. There needs to be kept constantly on hand a large sum of money to conduct the money-order department.

The port of Rochester is the best on Lake Ontario. The amount of customs received there the past year was $180,998.10.

There are about twenty subordinates under the collector in this custom-house. The amount of rent paid for use of office for custom-house is $750 per year. It has been more. The office has to be shifted from one place to another from year to year, as circumstances require. The accommodations are inadequate to the business of the office.

The collector of internal revenue pays $1,000 a year rent for the insufficient accommodations of the internal-revenue office. He collected the past year $974,869.52.

He has a large number of subordinates under his control, and has large numbers of valuable books and papers, property of the Government, which ought to be kept safely.

The United States marshal's office for the northern district of New York is situated at Rochester, but it is kept in a private building and the marshal pays his own rent.

There is a register in bankruptcy and two United States commissioners at Rochester, who furnish themselves with offices.

The United States district court is held at Rochester, but it is compelled to take such quarters in the county court-house as it can get. No rent is paid for its accommodation. If rooms were rented suitable for this court it would be quite expensive.

There has never been any Government building at Rochester.

Less than one-fourth of the revenues received at Rochester in a single year would purchase a site and erect a suitable building for conducting all the business of the Government at this place. Fifty thousand dollars will secure an ample site, and $250,000 will construct a satisfactory building.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended the passage of the bill in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Under date of June 1, 1880, the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. John Sherman, in a letter addressed to General Cook, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, says:

"The amount of revenue collected from all sources by the Government at Rochester, rental paid for the present inconvenient and unsatisfactory public offices, and the fact that Rochester is one of the largest and most enterprising cities in the State of New York are in my opinion sufficient evidence of the need of a Government building at that place for the accommodation of the United States courts and the customs, postal, and revenue service. I have therefore to recommend that the erection of a public building be authorized as reported by your committee."

In view of the urgent necessity of safe and suitable accommodations for the various offices of the United States at this place, your committee recommend the passage of a substitute for the bill H. R. 1186, which substitute conforms to the form of bill agreed upon by this committee and approved by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BAKER. Supplementing the remarks just made by my colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact: It appears by the papers accompanying the report that the space which will be provided in the building now in course of construction is only about one-half the space occupied for post-office purposes in rented quarters, where the accommodation is confessedly insufficient.

The revenue of the post-office for the past year is almost $200,000—over $199,000. The clerical force of the office, too, has increased largely since the original bill was passed.

The revenues from that district to the Government aggregate now, I can say without fear of contradiction, a million and a half of dollars, and they are growing larger year by year.

The Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury united in recommending increase of the limit from $300,000 to $500,000.

If this city were located in the State of my friend from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] or in the State of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], instead of being compelled to come here and ask for this increase in the limit they would have provided in the original bill for $500,000, and no questions would have been asked. Here is a city with increasing population, growing business, large industries, advancing year by year, and it is imperative larger accommodations should be afforded in the public building now in course of construction in that city. It would be a waste of money to go on and finish the building according to the present limit, while to provide for the change indicated in the pending measure would give probably all the necessary quarters and accommodations required for the use of the Government departments in that city. I believe there should be no objection to the passage of the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I have here, and I suppose it can be seen by the House, a plan showing the difference of space which will be gained if this bill should pass. The red lines indicate the area included in the present plan of building. If this bill be passed those blue lines indicate the increased area necessary for the public business in that city. We had better stop and sell the building than complete it on the present plan for the purpose for which it is intended. This bill will give sufficient space, and it will be more economical for the Government to increase the limit of appropriation than to take any other course in this exigency. The committee arrived at that conclusion after having called for plans of the building; and after having received full information of the situation in this case, they unanimously recommended the passage of this bill granting an increase of $200,000, and I now ask for the vote.

By inadvertence and contrary to the usual form of drawing up our bills an appropriation has been included here, and I have been directed to move an amendment to eliminate that portion of the bill. I move to strike out the words which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said additional sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act and for the purpose of enlarging and increasing the said building and the site therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate having expired the bill is now open to amendment, and the first question will be on the amendment moved by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendment to the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erecting of a public building at Rochester, N. Y., and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH LINES.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroads was called.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroads to call up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5874) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 21 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, or the act of which this is amendatory, there shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest, as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said road, and so from year to year until the whole shall be completed as provided under the provisions of this act; and the several railway companies to which grants of land are made by this act, or the act approved July 1, 1862, of which this act is amendatory, their successors and assigns, shall, within ninety days from the passage of this act, or within sixty days from the date of the receipt at the respective district land offices of the approved plat or plats of townships embracing lands within the established limits of the grant or grants, make and file in the said district land office, under existing regulations, their lists of selections of the land claimed by them under their respective grants, and to deposit therewith in such district land office, or the Treasury of the United States, as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same; that in the event of the failure of said companies, or either of them, to pay the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying such land within the time prescribed by this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall immediately notify the president or treasurer of said company or companies of the amount of land which it or they are entitled to patent, and the amount of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, and that he is ready to deliver to the company or companies, it or their successors or assigns, patents for all said tracts or parcels of land upon the payment of such costs; and if such company or companies shall not, within sixty days after the receipt of such notice, pay such costs, then and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior shall notify the Attorney-General of the United States of such failure or default, and of the amount of such costs, as nearly as may be; whereupon said Attorney-General is authorized and directed to institute forthwith, in the name of the United States of America, in a circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of suits against the company or companies in default, any and all legal proceedings against said company or companies necessary and proper to secure the payment of all said costs, and of the further costs of all such legal proceedings; and upon the voluntary payment or collection of said costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents conveying to said company or companies, its or their successors or assigns, title to the lands to which it or they may be entitled, and shall place said patents upon record in his Department, and shall notify the president of such company that said patents have been so issued and recorded, and are ready for delivery to said company."

SEC. 2. That all the lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, to the several railroad companies therein named, which have been surveyed, and to which said companies respectively have become entitled to receive patents upon payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, as provided by section 21 of said amendatory act of July 2, 1864, notwithstanding such companies have not made such payment, shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, to the same extent as they would have been had such costs been paid and the lands conveyed to said railroad companies: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as applying to lands already forfeited by said railroad companies, or either of them, nor shall it operate to relieve any such company from any forfeiture heretofore incurred: And provided further, That prior to the payment of such costs of surveying by said railroad companies no taxes shall be imposed except in organized counties.

SEC. 3. That in any sale of such lands for taxes the moneys due or to become due the United States under said acts for such costs, fees, &c., shall be and remain a first lien on such lands, and shall be paid by the purchaser at such tax-sale to the receiver of public moneys in the land district wherein such lands are situate, whereupon, his title under the tax-sale being complete, such purchaser shall receive a patent for the land so purchased by him, and which patent shall operate only as an evidence of the tax title, which title shall be subject and subordinate to all the rights of the United States in respect of such lands growing out of the lien and security on such lands created in respect of the subsidy bonds issued by the United States in aid of the construction of said railroads, which facts and reservations shall be stated in such patents.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention for a short time I will endeavor to make plain the necessity for the passage of this act. I shall explain the present law, narrate some of the evils that have grown up under it, and make clear the remedy proposed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads, which is embodied in the bill before us.

In 1862 the Congress incorporated certain railroad companies for the purpose of building a railway, postal, and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. By the terms of the charter those companies were granted large quantities of the public land, and their bonds were indorsed by the Government for a great amount per mile. By the act of 1862 the Government was required, as the railroad companies should build each 40 miles of their line, to make over to them patents to the lands which they had earned under the contract. No action was taken by any of these companies under the act of 1862; and in 1864 the act of 1862 was amended, the amendments enlarging the original grants of land, enlarging the subsidy that the Government had agreed to give to the roads, and permitting the roads to obtain the subsidy bonds and lands granted to them upon the completion of each 20 miles of road instead of 40. By the terms of the amended act the railway companies were required to pay to the United States the costs incurred in surveying the lands to which they were entitled. To use the exact language of the act, they were to "pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands."

The twenty-first section of the amendatory act of 1864 contemplates that these sums should be paid by the railway companies at the completion of every 20 miles of their roads, so that the Government would only be required to advance a sufficient amount of money to survey the lands contiguous to 20 miles of road. Here is the section:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, by the said company or party in interest, as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said road, and so from year to year until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

When 20 miles of the road was finished, and the lands contiguous thereto had been surveyed, the intention of the act was that the companies should accept the patents, select the lands, receive the conveyance, and pay into the Treasury the amount of money that had been expended for the purpose of the surveys. With that money the Government could survey the next 20 miles, and so on until the completion of the entire road, and the companies had received all the lands to which they were entitled under the original granting act.

Inasmuch as the act of 1862, which originally granted these lands to the railroad companies, failed to provide that they should pay the cost of surveying, they objected to that feature of the amendatory act of 1864, and claimed that Congress had no right to fix that condition upon them because the original charter had failed to fix it there. That question has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States adversely to the claim of the railroads; so that there is now no question as to the constitutionality of that requirement.

The framers of this law, Mr. Speaker, had no conception of the practices that might grow up and that have grown up on the part of the railroad companies in respect to these lands. In 1869 the railroads were completed. In 1869, then, they were entitled to all their lands. Upon the completion of each 20 miles of these roads the companies promptly applied for and received the indorsement of the Government upon their bonds. It was supposed that they would as promptly apply for and receive patents to the lands which they had earned. This they have not done. The Government of the United States has expended nearly $1,000,000 to pay the cost of surveying these lands, and if there were no other view of the question than that, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be the duty of this Congress to require these companies to reimburse the United States for the amount of money which has been expended for their benefit. But, sir, the question reaches farther than that. It is not alone the question of indebtedness on their part to us; that is not alone the evil that ought to be remedied; but there is another, and to a number of States and Territories a very much greater evil that has arisen from the practices of these companies in respect to their lands.

By the terms of the original charter the companies were permitted to dispose of their lands within three years, so as to defeat the right of individuals to enter upon and homestead thereon as they can on the rest of the public domain. In other words, unless the companies disposed of the lands within three years from the time of acquiring the right to them then it was provided that individuals might enter upon the lands and homestead there as they could upon other public lands, paying to the railway companies instead of to the United States the cost of such proceedings. After the expiration of the three years mentioned in the charter a question arose as to whether the companies had, within the meaning of the act, disposed of the lands or as to whether they were still open to settlement as the rest of the public domain. The companies, or one of them, within three years from the time it acquired the right to these lands mortgaged them, I believe, for the sum of $10,000,000. The company claimed that the giving of the mortgage, or the exercise of the right of mortgage, was a disposal of the lands within the meaning of the act, and that hence they were no longer subject to entry as homestead, but were practically and substantially disposed of.

That question went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of that court affirmed and established the views of the railroads; in other words, they had disposed of the land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the States and Territories where this land is situated, understanding from that decision that the railroad companies were in all respects owners of this land as any individual or any corporation is the owner of that to which he or they have a complete equitable title, undertook to tax these lands. They had them assessed as in the case of other real estate within their Territorial limits. They imposed upon them such taxes, such burdens as all other property of like character is required to bear. The railway companies claimed that the States and Territories had no right to impose a tax because the legal title to the property is in the Government of the United States, and that the sovereignty of the State or Territory could not be exercised to impose a tax upon property the title to which was still in the United States Government.

The Supreme Court of the United States upon a review of that question held that so long as the patent had not issued out of the United States, so long as something was left to be done by the company before they would have a complete equity in the land, that it could not be taxed, because if you granted the power to tax you granted the power to take away and destroy the lien upon the land retained by the United States Government. They held that if the patent had issued whether the costs were paid or not the lands were taxable, because then the legal title would be in the company. They held that if the company had done everything that it was required to do to demand a title then they would be taxable, although the patent was not out of the Government, because they had a complete equity in the land. But inasmuch as the company had not paid the cost of survey to give to the States and Territories the right to tax would give them the power to destroy the lien that the United States had elected to reserve to reimburse them for the advances they had made for the companies.

Therefore, you see, Mr. Speaker, as regards this vast domain, this great number of acres of land which has been given to these corporations they hold it, they control it, they exercise all the rights of ownership over it; and yet, sir, they escape the burden that falls upon every other species of property owned by every other individual in this country.

When the railroad companies under this decision of the Supreme Court were assured of the fact that they might deal and traffic with this land as they pleased and yet so long as the legal title remained in the Government they should not be taxable, they entered further upon a disposition of them. They sold them to individuals, they bargained them off on long time, leaving the title in the Government, and thereby relieving the purchaser of the land from paying any tax upon it to support the institutions of the States or Territories that protected him in his property as it did every other citizen of such State or Territory.

It appears, sir, it was a common practice in the State of Kansas, represented by my friend Mr. HANBACK, who is on the committee—it is a fact which is within his personal knowledge that in that State the railway company will sell a piece of land and give the purchaser ten years' time in which to pay for it. The purchaser enters upon it; he cultivates it; he improves it; he uses it in like manner as all owners of property use like property, and yet he is not required to pay to the State of Kansas or to the county in which it lies one dollar of tax upon the land. He holds it, or may hold it, for ten years, and even then, Mr. Speaker, unless some action is taken by Congress upon this question, even then he will not be required to pay the taxes. He may take a fee-simple title from a railway company. He may be willing to risk such warranty as to his title, and accept a deed of that sort, and then, sir, that man would never be subject to taxation in the State where the land lies, for the simple reason that the patent, the legal evidence of title, has not gone out of the Government.

From those States and Territories where this land lies there comes up a complaint, and in my judgment it is a just complaint. They say that the Government of the United States has no right to so conduct its affairs with these great corporations as to prevent the exercise on their part of the sovereign right to tax property within their territorial limits. The effect of this has been to greatly injure and embarrass those States and Territories. The effect has been to add another to the many favors that have already been shown these corporations by the Government of the United States. I do not propose, sir, to appeal to the prejudices of members against these great corporations. I do not propose, sir, to deprive them of any rights as to the vast domain we have given them. This is a plain, naked business proposition, and should be settled on business principles. We should scrupulously avoid doing injustice to these companies, and at the same time be careful to see they are not longer permitted to pursue a practice unjust to us, and more unjust to the States and Territories in which their lands lie.

The following extract from the report I had the honor of submitting to the Forty-eighth Congress on this subject shows the names of railroads taking land and the state of their accounts with the Government in respect thereto:

The corporations or companies taking grants of land under the act of 1862 and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto are as follows:

Union Pacific Railway Company.

Union Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company.

Union Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Denver Pacific Railway Company.

Central Branch Union Pacific Railway Company.

Central Pacific Railway Company.

Central Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Western Pacific Railway Company.

Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska; and Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company.

Your committee have sought to ascertain exactly how much land each of these companies are entitled to patent under the acts incorporating them, and the precise amount they will be required to pay into the United States Treasury for surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, but have been unable to do so. In response to an application by your committee the Commissioner of the Land Office furnishes us the following statement on this subject:

"In my opinion an estimate sufficient for the committee's purpose can be obtained by computing the full amount which the companies could acquire in case none of the granted lands had been disposed of prior to the time their rights attached. The rate per acre for surveying may be fixed at the average rate paid by each company upon lands already selected. Such an estimate, while merely approximating the costs which the companies will ultimately be required to pay, will, it is believed, exceed that amount in each instance. Upon this basis the grant to the Union Pacific Railway Company is estimated at 13,222,400 acres. Said company has selected 2,006,827 acres, and paid $45,086.23 as the costs of surveying the same. There remains of the grant 11,215,573 acres unselected, the costs of surveying which is estimated at $377,661.95. Said company has received patents for 1,954,603.08 acres. The grant to the central branch of the Union Pacific, making allowance for overlapping limits of the Kansas Pacific, is estimated at 1,160,000 acres; 265,244 acres have been selected, and $5,188.13 paid as costs of survey thereon. The balance of the grant is estimated at 894,756 acres, the costs of survey of which amounts to $17,501.42. Patents have issued for 187,447.99 acres.

"The grant to the Kansas Pacific is estimated at 6,000,000 acres; 1,483,067 acres have been selected, and $29,841.71 paid as costs of surveying the same. The remainder of the grant is estimated at 4,516,933 acres, and the costs of surveying the same at $128,826. Said company has received patents for 963,714.03 acres.

"The grant to the Central Pacific Company is estimated at 9,248,200 acres (allowance being made for area of Great Salt Lake, in Utah, falling in the limits of the grant). The company has selected 884,976 acres and paid $48,235.69 for survey thereof. This leaves a balance of 8,363,224 acres, the cost of surveying which is estimated at $417,233.91; 780,879.40 acres have been patented to said company.

"The area of the grant to the Western Pacific is estimated at 1,576,448 acres; 444,466 acres have been selected, and $17,220.72 paid for surveying the same. The remainder of the grant amounts to 1,131,982 acres, and the cost of surveying the same is estimated at $43,807.70. Under this grant patents have issued for 446,230.65 acres.

"The area of the grant to the Denver Pacific Company is estimated at 1,024,000 acres, allowance being made for the overlapping limits of the Union Pacific grant; 183,424 acres have been selected and the cost of surveying, amounting to $7,661.78, paid. The remainder of said grant is 840,576 acres, and the cost of surveying the same is estimated at $36,144.79; 164,721.51 acres have been patented under this grant.

"The Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska has selected 2,378,556 acres, and paid $50,515.79 for survey thereof. Patents have issued for 2,373,290.77 acres. Without undertaking to decide now that this grant is fully satisfied, it is believed by this office that said company will receive but little, if any, more land.

"The Sioux City and Pacific Company has received patents for 41,398.23 acres, upon which the costs of survey, amounting to $680.13, has been paid on account of overlapping limits of other and older grants. It is believed that with the exception of a few isolated tracts the amount patented to this company, as above stated, is all the lands inuring to this grant."

From this statement it appears that the total sum the various roads would be required to pay into the Treasury to patent all the lands they have earned under the law would be $1,021,175.77. In order to determine what part of this sum has been already paid out by the United States it is necessary to ascertain what part of the subsidy lands have been surveyed, and we present an estimate furnished us from the Land Office on this subject:

Name of road.	Estimated area of grant.	Estimated area surveyed.	Estimated area unsurveyed.
Union Pacific—Omaha to Ogden	13,222,400	12,104,960	1,117,440

Central Branch Union Pacific	1,160,000	1,160,000	.....
Kansas Pacific	6,000,000	6,000,000	.....
Denver Pacific	1,024,000	1,024,000	.....
Central Pacific—Ogden to Sacramento	9,248,200	4,467,500	4,780,700
Central Pacific, successor to Western Pacific	1,576,448	1,288,448	*288,000
Sioux City and Pacific	651,328	651,328	.....
Totals	35,193,288	29,007,148	6,186,140

*Nearly all swamp and overflowed, according to maps.

By the above figures it will be seen that about six-sevenths of the whole has been surveyed.

OSCAR HINRICHS,
Principal Clerk Surveys.

It will thus be seen that six-sevenths of the land now due these railroads has been surveyed, and that the United States has actually paid out for their benefit about the sum of $875,293.50.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] retains the floor.

DEATH OF SENATOR MILLER, OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the melancholy duty devolves upon me to announce to the House the death of Senator JOHN F. MILLER, of California, who died in this city to-day after a prolonged illness. Congress will undoubtedly set apart some day hereafter for the purpose of giving expression to the sentiment entertained for the character and distinguished public services of Senator MILLER. As a present mark of respect for the memory of the deceased Senator I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Senator JOHN F. MILLER, of California.

Resolved, That out of respect to his memory this House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Petition of Frederick Gates, for removal of the charge of desertion, &c.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 1732) for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the chief-justice of the Court of Claims, requesting that $4,000 be placed in the urgent deficiency bill for printing and binding for that court; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 13, 1886, certain information in regard to the so-called fast mail west of Chicago; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is still confined to his room and unable to transact business, and I present to the Senate for him a petition of the members of Boonville (Mo.) Local Assembly Knights of Labor, earnestly urging the passage of the bill (H. R. 1914) for the restoration of wages in the Government Printing Office. The petition was sent to my colleague, and I present it for him. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also present a memorial of citizens of Boonville, Mo., likewise sent to my colleague, remonstrating against the further immigration and importation of Chinese labor into the United States, and urging that such importation and immigration be absolutely prohibited. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also present a petition of Local Assembly No. 1884 of the Knights of Labor, of Moberly, in the State of Missouri, praying that liberal appropriations be made of the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance and redistribution among the people in the form of wages of funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and on what they wear, and indorsing the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal. I also present a like petition from the same assembly of Knights of Labor, which was sent to my colleague. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Marlborough, Mass., praying that Congress may be liberal in the expenditure of money for internal improvements, and especially in favor of the early construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Boston (Mass.) Merchants' Association, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to regulate the rate of postage on fourth-class mail-matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of the town of Derby, Conn., praying especially that Congress will undertake the construction of the Hennepin Canal, and generally that it will be liberal in appropriations for works of internal improvement. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of the monthly meeting of Friends of Albion, Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Mary E. Thompson, a citizen of the District of Columbia, praying for relief from excessive taxation and assessments; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JACKSON presented a petition of citizens of Knoxville, Tenn., praying that Congress at the present session pass a joint resolution submitting to the several State Legislatures a proposition to so amend the national Constitution as to protect the women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of Marlborough, Mass., a large manufacturing town in that State, approving and urging upon Congress the policy of liberal appropriations for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, the policy which has found expression in the river and harbor bills in past years, and especially in favor of constructing the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Mississippi favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the Tombigbee River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the bill (S. 334) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, and to release and quitclaim to any State, county, or municipality all equity and interest that the United States may have, by reason of the neglect or refusal of any railroad company to pay costs of locating and selecting lands donated by act of Congress, in and to lands sold and to be sold by States, counties, or municipalities for non-payment of taxes by any railroad company, also when costs of surveying and locating lands shall be due and payable by corporations entitled to the same, and for other purposes; and the bill (S. 1518) relating to the taxation of railroad-grant lands, and for other purposes, moved their indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 1812) relating to the taxation of railroad-grant lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 761) granting a pension to William Webster; and

A bill (S. 283) granting a pension to Isaac N. Minshall.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 653) granting a pension to William Cozzins, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Noble, late of Company A, Nineteenth Maine Volunteer Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SABIN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clarke's Fork Railroad Company, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and submitted a report thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. From what committee is the bill reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONGER. The subject-matter of that bill has been heretofore before the Committee on Territories. It has been under the charge of that committee and they have made a report upon it

Mr. SAWYER. I think the Senator is mistaken. Perhaps some bill relating to the subject may have been before the Committee on Territories, but a bill similar to this one was reported in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses from the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONGER. It is a bill granting the right of way through the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. SABIN. Yes; over the northern border of the Yellowstone Park. I think the Senator will remember that a motion to refer a similar bill to the Committee on Territories in the last Congress was voted down, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and it was reported by the Committee on Railroads at the last Congress.

Mr. CONGER. Prima facie I can hardly believe that the Senate would commit such an error as that, but it may possibly be that it was done, perhaps in a thin Senate or something of that kind——

Mr. SABIN. Perhaps in the absence of the Senator from Michigan!

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 135) granting a pension to Mary A. Tibbets, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GRAY, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1034) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyright, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyright; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, to report it with sundry amendments. I give notice that to-morrow I shall ask to have the bill disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT ALTON.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes, to report it favorably with an amendment.

As there is but a single amendment reported to the bill, and for some reasons it is very desirable that the bill should be passed as speedily as possible if the Senate approves the bill, I ask for its present consideration. It is not a very long bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that will be allowed, as it is very important that the work should be proceeded with at an early day.

Mr. HALE. Is it the report of a committee made at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HALE. From what committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in section 3, line 6, after the word "above," to strike out "extreme;" so as to read:

The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 50 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I omitted to note the word "extreme" in the same connection in another place. I ask that that may be also stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 21, after the word "above," it is proposed to strike out the word "extreme;" so as to read:

And the spans shall not be less than 200 feet in length in the clear, with two side spans of 300 feet each, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with and not be less than 10 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of the bridge itself at right angles to the current of the river, and the spans shall location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I may say to the Senate that this bill has all the safeguards for navigation which the Committee on Commerce has so carefully prepared for all bridge bills for rivers of that kind for the last five or ten years.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1814) granting a pension to William R. Chapman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1815) granting a pension to Solomon Williams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1816) restoring to the public domain and opening to settlement a portion of the Siletz Indian reservation in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1817) for the relief of John McKernan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1818) for the relief of Jesse J. Busby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1819) making an appropriation to pay the expenses of a military expedition for the exploration of the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1820) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying Indian depredation claims which have been audited and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and reported to Congress; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. A few days since I introduced a bill authorizing persons having claims against the Government for Indian depredations to sue in the Court of Claims, and the bill was laid upon the table for future action. I then gave notice that at some time when it would suit the convenience of the Senate I should address the Senate upon that bill. I also ask that the same course may be pursued with regard to this bill. I ask that it may lie upon the table, and I propose to present the two at the same time on Monday next, unless the business of the Senate then should make it inadvisable to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie upon the table.

Mr. BECK (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1821) for the relief of John A. Fairfax; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1822) for the relief of Maj. E. A. Hancock; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1823) to authorize the purchase of a site and erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices at the city of Allentown, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SABIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1824) for the relief of Jearum Atkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1825) granting a pension to Elizabeth Forgey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1826) granting a pension to Andrew J. Burrell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1827) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1828) for the indemnification and relief of Renia Carolina Warlick, nee Henson, of the North Carolina Cherokees; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HAMPTON, it was—

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Ernest H. Wardwell be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes. It is the bill I gave notice on Friday that I should call up at the earliest moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is this the bill of which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] gave notice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is the bill a Senate or a House bill?

Mr. PLUMB. It is Senate bill 149.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is the bill being now read for information?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is being read for consideration, the Senate having by unanimous consent ordered it to be done.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Are there any amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I suppose they will be acted on first, before any other amendments are to be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The amendments will be stated in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 14, after the words "right to," the committee report to insert the words "acquire from the Government, at the price fixed by law;" so as to read:

The person or persons having purchased any of said lands as aforesaid, or their grantees, shall have the right to acquire from the Government, at the price fixed by law, the lands so purchased, not exceeding one quarter-section to any one purchaser.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 18, after the word "purchase," to insert "and the payment of the price thereof;" so as to read:

Upon making proof to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior of the fact of such purchase and the payment of the price thereof, which proof may be first made at the local land office of the district in which said land may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 6, line 5, to strike out the words "the same" and insert "this act," and in line 6 to strike out the words "this act" and insert "the same;" so as to read:

That all actual, bona fide settlers upon any of the lands hereby resumed and which may be decided as aforesaid to belong to the United States, who possess the proper qualifications under the general land laws, and are in actual occupancy thereof at the date of the passage of this act, shall, for the purposes of the same, be considered as having entered upon the same lawfully, and shall be treated as if at the date of their entry upon said land the same had been in fact subject to entry under existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a report which accompanies the bill, but it is longer I think than would be edifying to have read to the Senate, and I think I can state in a much briefer way what I conceive to be the facts and the merits of this controversy.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to have the report read, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator has a copy of it, I suppose.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir, I have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota has a right to have the report read if he desires it.

Mr. PLUMB. Of course there can be but one purpose in that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Well, I think that is a very gratuitous remark of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report being called for, it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB January 18, 1886:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes, make the following report:

The bill entire, as agreed upon by the committee and reported to the Senate on the 11th day of January, 1886, is as follows:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

"DECEMBER 8, 1885.—Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced the following bill, which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

"JANUARY 11, 1886.—Reported by Mr. PLUMB with amendments, namely: Omit the parts inclosed in brackets, and insert the parts printed in italics.

"A bill forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Iowa to hear and determine any controversy of either a legal or equitable nature that may exist between the United States and the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person who claims any lands under the laws of said State or of the United States, by reason of an act of Congress entitled 'An act for a grant of lands in the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State,' approved May 12, 1864, concerning such of said lands as have been patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and have not been by said State conveyed to said railroad company, the United States hereby asserting its revisionary right to all of said lands, or so much thereof as shall be found to have been patented in excess of the amount of land earned by said company, in compliance with the act of Congress aforesaid, and hereby resume possession of the same, subject to the conditions hereinafter named.

"SEC. 2. That the district attorney of the United States for the northern district of Iowa, under the direction of the Attorney-General, shall bring suit at law or in equity in the circuit court for said district against any persons or corporations who are claiming the ownership of the lands granted in said act to the State of Iowa and by said State withheld as aforesaid, so as to fully ascertain and settle all questions as to the interest of the United States in said lands; and any persons or corporations who are claiming any of said lands under the State of Iowa, or by reason of the act of Congress aforesaid, and who are necessary or proper parties, shall be joined as defendants therein; and said court may cause publication to be made, under the laws and rules of court, to bring in non-resident defendants as parties to the suit.

"SEC. 3. That the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person not made a party defendant in such suit, may petition the court to be admitted as a party defendant therein, and may set up any interest such defendant may have in the said lands, in such manner as the court may direct, and have the judgment of the court upon the same.

"SEC. 4. That the parties to such suit, respectively, shall have the right to revise the judgment or decree of the circuit court rendered therein in the Supreme Court of the United States, on writ of error or appeal, under the laws governing appeals and writs of error in civil causes decided in the circuit courts of the United States: Provided, That such writ of error or appeal is prosecuted within six months from the date of the enrolling of the final decree in such cause; and said cause shall be advanced on the docket of the Supreme Court so as to be heard as speedily as the other business of the court in which the United States is a party will admit.

"SEC. 5. That if any of the lands mentioned herein are adjudged to belong to the United States, the same shall constitute a part of the public domain, and shall be disposed of as lands of the United States that are subject to homestead and pre-emption entry: Provided, That in case any lands so decided to belong to the United States have been sold (not encumbered) by said railroad company, prior to January 1, 1884, to persons who purchased the same in good faith for the purpose of making for themselves homes, and have in good faith occupied the same, or for the purpose of adding to other property occupied by them as homes or for business purposes, the person or persons having purchased any of said lands as aforesaid, or their grantees, shall have the right to acquire from the Government, at the price fixed by law, the lands so purchased, not exceeding one quarter-section to any one purchaser, upon making proof to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior of the fact of such purchase and the payment of the price thereof, which proof may be first made at the local land office of the district in which said land may be located; and upon the proof being made as above within twelve months after the passage of this act, patents shall issue to the party or parties entitled thereto for the land, not exceeding one quarter-section to any one purchaser as aforesaid.

"SEC. 6. That all actual, bona fide settlers upon any of the lands hereby resumed and which may be decided as aforesaid to belong to the United States, who possess the proper qualifications under the general land laws, and are in actual occupancy thereof at the date of the passage of [the same] this act, shall, for the purposes of the same, be considered as having entered upon the same lawfully and shall be treated as if at the date of their entry upon said land the same had been in fact subject to entry under existing laws; and in any proceeding to perfect their titles the date of their actual occupancy shall be considered as the date of entry: Provided, That such occupancy shall be continuous; and such persons shall have preference in making formal entries at the land-office to the extent of such land as each of said settlers may occupy, not exceeding one quarter-section to each settler, and be entitled to enter under existing laws: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall adopt rules to govern such entries, not inconsistent with the terms of this act; and in case of conflicting claims among alleged actual settlers, he shall, in deciding the same, give preference to the one who may establish prior and continuous occupancy, regardless of the date of entry at the local land-office."

The facts upon which the committee rely for their justification in reporting this bill and advocating its passage are as follows:

In 1864, by an act of Congress approved May 12 (see United States Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 72), a grant of lands was made to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads, the first section of which grant was in language following, viz:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City, in said State, to the south line of the State of Minnesota, at such point as the said State of Iowa may select, between the Big Sioux and the west fork of the Des Moines River; also, to said State for the use and benefit of the McGregor Western Railroad Company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from a point at or near the foot of Main street, South McGregor, in said State, in a westerly direction, by the most practicable route, on or near the forty-third parallel of north latitude until it shall intersect the said road, running from Sioux City to the Minnesota State line in the county of O'Brien, in said State, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width, on each side of said roads; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads are definitely located, sold any section, or any part thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest the tiers of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections, designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or pre-emption has attached as aforesaid, which lands thus indicated by odd numbers and sections, by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be held by the State of Iowa for the uses and purposes aforesaid: Provided, That the land so selected shall in no case be located more than 20 miles from the lines of said roads: Provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by an act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose whatever, be and the same are hereby reserved and excepted from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said roads through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States."

Section 2 of said grant fixed double minimum value to the even-numbered sections remaining and lying within the limits of the said grant, and provided for their entry and sale.

Section 3 declared that the lands granted should remain subject to the disposal of the Legislature of Iowa for the purposes aforesaid and no other; and that the railroads should be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States free of all toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Section 4 of said act is as follows:

"SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be disposed of by said State for the purposes aforesaid only, and in manner following, namely: When the governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of either of said roads is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, then the Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the State patents for 100 sections of land for the benefit of the road having completed the 10 consecutive miles as aforesaid. When the governor of said State shall certify that another section of 10 consecutive miles shall have been completed as aforesaid, then the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents to said State in like manner for a like number; and when certificates for the completion of additional sections of 10 consecutive miles of either of said roads are from time to time made as aforesaid, additional sections of land shall be patented as aforesaid until said roads, or either of them, are completed, when the whole of the lands hereby granted shall be patented to the State for the uses aforesaid, and none other: Provided, That if the said McGregor Western Railroad Company, or assigns, shall fail to complete at least 20 miles of its said road during each and every year from the date of its acceptance of the grant provided for in this act, then the State may resume said grant and so dispose of the same as to secure the completion of a road on said line and upon such terms, within such time, as the State shall determine: Provided further, That if the said roads are not completed within ten years from their several acceptance of this grant the said lands hereby granted and not patented shall revert to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the completion of the said roads within such time, not to exceed five years, and upon such terms as the State shall determine: And provided further, That said lands shall not in any manner be disposed of or incumbered, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete said roads within five years after the ten years aforesaid then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid shall revert to the United States."

The further sections of the grant are not regarded material to a full understanding of the facts by which your committee have been guided in reaching their conclusions, and are therefore omitted.

The Eleventh General Assembly of the State of Iowa, by act approved April 3, 1866, accepted this grant, and as to the line of road first named in the granting act (the one in controversy here and the subject of the bill now under consideration), conferred the same upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, upon certain conditions therein expressed but not necessary to be here stated. This act of the Legislature of Iowa also authorized the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company to designate the terminal point on the south line of the State of Minnesota to which said road should be built.

Acceptance of the provisions of this act of the Legislature were filed with the secretary of state of Iowa, September 20, 1866. Another act of the same General Assembly, approved April 20, 1866, provides that where any lands are patented to the State under said grant, they shall be held in trust for the railroad company entitled thereto, and deeded to such company as the Legislature shall direct.

The Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company commenced the construction of its road under the provisions of said act of Congress and the act of the Legislature of the State of Iowa above referred to, beginning at the point selected by it on the south boundary line of the State of Minnesota and continuing southwest in the direction of Sioux City, Iowa, upon the line contemplated by the national and State grants, and by the spring of 1873 it had completed and put in operation its road in substantial compliance with said grants to the city of Le Mars, in Plymouth County, a distance of 56$\frac{13}{100}$ miles. Le Mars is distant from Sioux City about 26 miles, in a northeast direction.

Before the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company began the construction of its road on the south line of Minnesota as aforesaid, a railroad had been constructed by the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company from Dubuque, on the Mississippi River, to Sioux City via Le Mars, so that at the date of the beginning of the construction of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad a railroad already existed and was being operated between Le Mars and Sioux City.

When, therefore, the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company had completed its line to Le Mars, instead of continuing the construction of its road to Sioux City it made an agreement with the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company whereby the latter company permitted the former company to run its through trains from Le Mars to Sioux City over its track, the Sioux City and Saint Paul agreeing in consideration therefor not to continue the construction of its road from Le Mars to Sioux City, and not to do any local business, passenger, freight, or express, between these two points, which agreement has to this day been carried out and still exists.

As before stated, the length of railroad between the south line of Minnesota and Le Mars is 56.13 miles. The governor of Iowa certified to its proper completion in sections of 10 miles, as required by the act of Congress, as follows: On July 26, 1872, to the completion of two sections of 10 miles each; on August 10, 1872, to the completion of one section of 10 miles; on February 4, 1873, to the completion of two sections of 10 miles each. No certificate of completion was ever made by the governor covering the fraction of a 10-mile section, to wit, 6.13 miles of road built from the terminus of the last 10-mile section certfied by the governor to Le Mars.

Lands under the grant were patented to the State of Iowa, as follows:

	Acres.
List 1, patented October 16, 1872, contained	191,464.04
List 2, patented June 17, 1873, contained	205,374.76
List 3, patented January 25, 1875, contained	10,911.41
List 4, patented June 4, 1877, contained	160.00
Total	407,910.21

The last patent was for lands awarded in lieu of lands taken by settlers, and which were claimed to belong to the railroad company under the grant.

Of the lands so patented 212,067.66 acres are within the grant "in place"—that is, composed of the odd-numbered sections within 10 miles on each side of the road as supposed to have been located; and 195,842.55 acres were patented as indemnity—that is, in lieu of odd-numbered sections within 10 miles on each side of the road as above, which had been taken by settlers or otherwise at the date of the location of the line of road. Indemnity lands could be taken from any public lands nearest the odd sections so lost to the company "within 20 miles from the line of said road."

The company was entitled to 10 sections or 6,400 acres of land for each mile of road constructed and embraced within a section of 10 continuous miles. The construction of 5 sections of 10 miles each, as certified by the governor of Iowa, entitled the company to 500 sections, or 320,000 acres, if all the sections were full. This leaves out of account the fractional section of road of 6.13 miles in length, and to which reference will hereafter be made.

By an act of the Fifteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved March 13, 1874, the governor was "authorized and directed to certify to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company any or all lands which are now held by the State of Iowa in trust for the benefit of said railroad company, in accordance with the provisions" of the act of April 20, 1866, heretofore referred to.

But before the passage of this act there had been certified to the railroad company of the lands so granted to the State 322,421.91 acres, being an excess of 2,421.91 acres over the quantity possible to be earned by building the five full sections of road of 10 miles each. No lands were certified under the provisions of the act last above mentioned.

The number of acres of land patented to the State and which have not been certified to the railroad company is 85,457. These lands have been claimed by the railroad company, and the secretary of state of Iowa in his report for 1883 says:

"The president of said railroad company made an application in person for conveyances of all the lands that had been patented to the State for building said road, but the State authorities withheld 85,457.40 acres of the said lands because said road was not completed in accordance with the requirement of the act of Congress."

To this 85,457.40 acres the railroad company has never had any conveyance, either by deed, certification, or otherwise, either from the General Government or from the State of Iowa.

All the said railroad between the southern line of Minnesota and the city of Le Mars (being the entire amount ever constructed by said company under said grant) was so constructed within the time named in the act of Congress granting land for the completion of the entire line.

The line of definite location of said Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad, as shown by the map of the same on file in the General Land Office, is, for most of the distance from the Minnesota State line to a point opposite Le Mars, about six miles west of the line as constructed.

After it became known that the governor could not or would not certify additional lands to the railroad company under the State law of 1874, above quoted, the conviction that the lands patented to the State of Iowa, and which had not been certified to the railroad company, were public lands of the United States became prevalent, and settlers began to go upon and improve them. A loud demand was made that they should be reconveyed by the State to the United States, and the Legislature of Iowa did thereupon pass the following act:

"CHAPTER 107.—An act to resume all the lands and rights conferred upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company by or under an act of Congress approved May 12, A. D. 1864, to lands not heretofore earned by said company.

"Whereas by an act of Congress, approved May 12, A. D. 1864, entitled 'An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State,' certain lands were granted to the State of Iowa for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City, in said State, to the south line of Minnesota, at such point as the said State might select, between the Big Sioux and the west fork of the Des Moines River, which grant was made to, and accepted by, the State of Iowa, upon the conditions, restrictions, and qualifications therein named; and

"Whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 3, A. D. 1866, so much of the lands, interests, rights, powers, and privileges as were or might be conferred, in pursuance of said acts of Congress, to aid in the construction of the aforesaid road, were disposed of, granted, and conferred upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; and

"Whereas said act of Congress further provides that if the road accepting said grant is not completed within ten years from its acceptance thereof, the lands thereby granted and not patented should revert to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the completion of said road; and

"Whereas said Sioux City and Saint Paul Company duly accepted said grant on the 20th day of September, A. D. 1866, but has failed to complete or cause to be completed any road on the line adopted therefor, from Sioux City to Le Mars, in said State of Iowa, or any road in lieu thereof:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That all lands, and all rights to lands granted or intended to be granted to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company by said acts of Congress and of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, which have not been earned by said railroad company by a compliance with the conditions of said grant, be and the same are hereby absolutely and entirely resumed by the State of Iowa, and that the same be and are absolutely vested in said State as if the same had never been granted to said railroad company.

"SEC. 2. This act being deemed of immediate importance shall take effect and be in force from and after its publication in the Iowa State Register and the Sioux City Journal, newspapers published in the State of Iowa.

"Approved March 16, 1882."

This act operated to divest the State of Iowa of all title to the lands patented to it and uncertified in so far as they were lands not earned by the railroad company. But for the purposes of the controversy then existing the question as to whether the company had earned any portion of these lands by the construction of the 6.13 miles section was undecided.

Meanwhile the General Land Office had become interested, and the Commissioner addressed the following letter to the governor of Iowa:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1882.

SIR: By letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated the 3d instant, I was directed to lay before you a copy of my report to him of January 12th last, in relation to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad, and to request that you furnish this office with a detailed and particular statement of the condition of said road, and of the road from McGregor to Sheldon, now known as the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway, and also of the lands granted to the State of Iowa by act of Congress approved May 12, 1864, as shown by the State records.

I am also directed to request that you indicate what your action may be in regard to the surrender of the patents issued to the State for the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company, for lands which have not been earned by said company. A list of the lands patented for, but withheld from, the latter company, and a statement of the reasons for withholding them, is more particularly desired.

I inclose a copy of my report of January 12, 1882, aforesaid, and of the Secretary's letter of the 3d instant, and have to request your early attention to the subject-matter thereof.

Very respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND,
Commissioner.

Hon. BUREN R. SHERMAN,
Governor of Iowa.

This letter was furnished to the register of the State land office, who furnished the required information. Subsequently the Secretary of the Interior took the matter up and addressed the following letter to the governor of Iowa:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 6, 1883.

SIR: On the 7th day of March, 1882, the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed a letter to you in relation to certain lands in your State, granted to the State by the United States to aid in the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad, and the road from McGregor to Sheldon, now known as the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad, under the act of May 12, 1864. (13 Statutes, 72.)

In reply to that letter Hon. J. K. Powers, register of your State, addressed a communication, November 22, 1882, to the Commissioner, which has been referred to me by him, accompanied with a statement from the General Land Office, together with a copy of the letter addressed to you March 7, 1882.

Referring to these several communications, it appears that the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company built 56$\frac{13}{100}$ miles of road. This would entitle the company prima facie to 360,000 acres of land. But 70,345.67 acres of the above amount fall within the 10-mile limit of both roads, and by the decision of the United States circuit court for Iowa (which is in accordance with the rulings of this Department) each road takes a moiety. The grant is thus diminished by one-half (35,172.83 acres) of the amount of lands falling within the common 10-mile limits of both roads, leaving 324,827.17 acres as the amount earned. There have been patented to the State for the benefit of said Sioux City and Saint Paul road 407,910.21 acres, from which amount should be taken 40 acres twice patented. The excess, then, of patented lands above the amount the company has earned is 83,043.04 acres. Four patents containing these lands (407,910.21 acres) were issued between October 16, 1872, and June 8, 1877, and as to such excess were issued inadvertently, as the Secretary of the Interior had no authority under the granting act (section 4) to issue patents except upon completion of "any section of 10 consecutive miles."

The register in his report of November 22, 1882, states that 85,457.40 acres have been withheld from conveyance to said company by the State on account of the failure of the company to complete the road as required by the act of Congress making the grant.

The State of Iowa, by an act of her General Assembly, approved March 16, 1882, resumed to the State all "lands granted or intended to be granted to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company," by "acts of Congress and of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa," because said company had failed to complete said road within ten years from the date of the acceptance of the grant.

The act of Congress making the grant contains the following proviso, viz:

"Provided further, That if the said roads are not completed within ten years from their several acceptance of this grant, the said lands hereby granted and not patented shall revert to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the completion of the said roads within such time, not to exceed five years, and upon such terms as the State shall determine: And provided further, That said lands shall not in any manner be disposed of or encumbered, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete said roads within five years after the ten years aforesaid, then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid shall revert to the United States." Therefore the 83,043.03 acres of land aforesaid, not having been earned within the ten years by said company by the completion of said road, and not having been used or disposed of by said State within five years after the lapse of said ten years, reverted to the United States.

The State (although regarding the question as unsettled) does not, it would seem, decline to restore such lands to the United States, but in reply to the letter of March 7, 1882, addressed to you, the register states it would be improper to surrender the patents in accordance with the request of the Commissioner, because such patents contain as well the lands which have been earned and transferred to the said company as those which have not been earned and were withheld and are resumed by the State.

He further states that "the governor would not even have authority to relinquish to the General Government any of these lands patented to the State without an act of the General Assembly empowering him to make such relinquishment; and no such law exists."

If there is no authority vested in you or any of the officers of the State to revest the United States with the legal title to the unearned lands, I urge upon you the propriety of obtaining authority from the General Assembly as early as possible, in order that such lands may be restored to the public domain.

Unless some early action is taken looking to that end it would become the duty of this Department to recommend a resort to legal proceedings for the restoration of such lands to the General Government.

I would suggest that the patents containing lands, both earned and unearned, could be surrendered, and cancellation could be made upon the books of the General Land Office as to the unearned lands and a new patent be issued to the State embracing all earned lands, containing a recitation (with other proper recitations) as to taking effect by relation as of the date of the former patents; or, the officers of the State, under proper authority, could by deed reconvey to the United States the unearned lands.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. BUREN R. SHERMAN,
Governor of Iowa.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior was promptly published, and occasioned great excitement among people far and near who were desirous of obtaining homes upon the public domain. The letter, coupled with the other conceded facts in the case, was very properly regarded as settling the public character of the lands beyond controversy, and such as were then unoccupied were settled upon at once. Following this the Legislature of Iowa again addressed itself to the subject, and an act was passed, as follows:

"CHAPTER 71.—An act to relinquish and reconvey to the United States all lands and rights to lands granted to the State of Iowa by the act of Congress entitled 'An act for a grant of land to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in the State of Iowa,' approved May 12, A. D. 1864, which have not been earned pursuant to the provisions of said act.

"Whereas by an act of Congress approved May 12, A. D. 1864, entitled 'An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State,' certain lands were granted to the State of Iowa for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City in said State to the south line of Minnesota, at such point as the State might select between the Big Sioux and the West Fork of the Des Moines River, which grant was made to and accepted by the State of Iowa upon the conditions, restrictions, and qualifications therein named; and

"Whereas by acts of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 3, A. D. 1866, and April 20, A. D. 1866, the lands, rights, powers, duties, and trusts conferred upon the State of Iowa by said act of Congress were duly accepted on the part of the State of Iowa; and

"Whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 3, A. D. 1866, so much of the lands, interests, rights, powers, and privileges as were or might be conferred in pursuance of said act of Congress to aid in the construction of the aforesaid road were disposed of, granted, and conferred upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; and

"Whereas said railroad company duly accepted said grant but failed to complete said railroad as required by the terms and conditions of said grant; and

"Whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved March 16, A. D. 1882, all lands and all rights to lands granted or intended to be granted to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company by said acts of Congress and of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, which had not been earned by said railroad company by a compliance with the conditions of said grant, were absolutely and entirely resumed by the State of Iowa, and vested in said State, as absolutely as though the same had never been granted to said railroad company; and

"Whereas it is desirable that all lands and rights to lands resumed by the State of Iowa as aforesaid should be conveyed to and vested in the United States to the end that such lands shall be made subject to the use of actual settlers, as provided by the acts of Congress relating thereto: Now, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That all lands and all rights to lands resumed and intended to be resumed by chapter 107 of the acts of the Nineteenth General Assembly of the State of Iowa are hereby relinquished and conveyed to the United States.

"SEC. 2. The governor of the State of Iowa is hereby authorized and directed to certify to the Secretary of the Interior all lands which have heretofore been patented to the State to aid in the construction of said railroad, and which have not been patented by the State to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and the list of land so certified by the governor shall be presumed to be the lands relinquished and conveyed by section 1 of this act: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to apply to lands situated in the counties of Dickinson and O'Brien.

"SEC. 3. This act being deemed of immediate importance shall take effect and be in force from and after its publication in the Iowa State Register, a newspaper published at Des Moines, Iowa, and the Sioux City Journal, a newspaper published at Sioux City, Iowa.

"Approved March 27, 1884."

After the passage of this act the railroad company sued out of the State district court of Woodbury County, Iowa, a temporary injunction against the governor of the State, restraining him from certifying to the Secretary of the Interior the lands which the Legislature directed him to so certify, and no certification of the lands relinquished by the State of Iowa has ever been made to the Interior Department.

The foregoing are believed to be the material facts in the case. Extended argument would seem to be unnecessary.

The granting act provides specifically that if the road should not be completed within the time named in the act (which has long since elapsed) the lands undisposed of should revert to the United States. The State of Iowa has done all in its power to convey to the United States, by means of the acts above quoted, all the interest originally conveyed by patent from the United States. It is probably necessary, further, that the United States should declare a forfeiture of the unearned lands and assert the reversionary interest provided for in the original act. This the bill reported by the committee provides for.

The State of Iowa being a naked trustee, without interest, it is not claimed that her action in reconveying to the United States the lands, the subject of the trust, can defeat the railroad company, the beneficiary of the trust, of its rights therein.

The question remains therefore to be settled now, just as it would have been if Iowa had not reconveyed, what lands the company have earned by a compliance with the act of Congress. Such lands covered by the grant as they have not earned revert to the Government. It is probable that the company fairly earned ten sections to the mile for the first 50 miles of road constructed, and there can be no claim for lands for any portion of the line between Le Mars and Sioux City, for no road was constructed between those points.

The chief controversy, then, is as to the claim of the company asserted before the committee, and in the last Congress, to lands for the 6$\frac{1}{10}$ miles of road by them constructed and for which no lands were certified by the governor. The authority of the governor in the premises was derived from the act of Congress. Under this he could only certify to the completion of the road in sections of 10 consecutive miles. Any act outside this authority would have been void. The governor therefore could not have certified to the construction of the 6 miles, and without his certificate there could be no lands patented. But even if the Interior Department could have acted independently of the governor, it was circumscribed exactly as the governor was, because it could only patent lands as the road was completed in sections of 10 miles. Thus it is inevitable that there must be legislation before the railroad company can get lands on account of the construction of the 6 miles—that is, if it is to have the lands at all.

The company ask Congress to pass an act affirmatively giving lands for the six miles—that is to say, practically making a new grant, for that is the complexion of it if the original act does not give the lands to the company; and if that act does give the lands to the company then all that is necessary is some proper and effective means of declaring what the law is and enforcing it. The only way to do this is by a suit in the proper court. This the bill of the committee provides for.

The company claim that to have built from Le Mars to Sioux City would have been a useless waste of money, for a road already existed between these places; that they were therefore warranted in stopping at Le Mars and claiming lands for the 6-mile fraction, and especially because they made a running arrangement whereby through trains were run to Sioux City, the terminus fixed by the granting act. To this it is replied:

That the company did not need to build to Le Mars at all. It had a scope of more than 50 miles within which to fix its initial point on the southern line of Minnesota, and could have so located its line as to have run far to the east or to the west of Le Mars, and built through to Sioux City in compliance with the terms and intention of the act of Congress, leaving ample distance between its own and the line of the other company to obtain ample local business for the support of its line.

The fact that the road of the Dubuque and Sioux City Company was nearly completed before the Sioux City and Saint Paul commenced construction is evidence sufficient to support the belief that the latter company built to Le Mars with the purpose and with the intent of stopping there and getting the benefit of a line of road to Sioux City without constructing it, as called for by the act of Congress.

Having taken this choice with their eyes open, they should be obliged to accept of the legal consequences of the same. They consulted their own interest in order to defeat the intention of the act of Congress, and can not now be permitted to plead a lack of knowledge of the legal consequences in order to obtain new rights. Neither can the contract whereby the company agreed with the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company to do no local business between Le Mars and Sioux City, and not to build to Sioux City, be overlooked.

It is altogether probable that this contract, so clearly against public policy and so violative of the intention of the act of Congress under which the lands were granted, would have worked a forfeiture of the entire grant if known and availed of at the proper time. And the committee believe this to be a full and complete offset and answer to the claim of the company to what it is pleased to call "equitable consideration" at the hands of Congress. Their opposition to the bill under consideration is evidence that they do not believe themselves entitled to any lands for the six miles under the law as it now stands. If this is not so, why oppose a bill which snbmits every question at issue to the proper United States circuit court.

Inasmuch as legislation must be had in order that the rights of the Government and the railroad company may be determined, why oppose it now that it is in shape to go forward? The only answer is that the company hope to postpone the final settlement until such time as the settlers, wearied by delay and injured by lack of title, will pay them for their assumed interest in the lands.

The bill under consideration gives to such purchasers of land from the railroad company as have occupied the land purchased in good faith for homestead purposes prior right to purchase such land, not exceeding 160 acres to any one person, at the Government price. This concession may be considered of doubtful propriety, as the railroad company, having neither title nor shadow of it, there is no equity against the Government in favor of purchasers under it. But the committee are advised that there are not over three or four persons who could claim the benefit of this provision, and that their claims are not contested by any other actual settler.

The lands in question being occupied by settlers who went upon them in good faith, with the purpose of making for themselves homes, such persons are protected by the bill as to all lands which may be found by the court to belong to the National Government.

In the opinion of the committee there can be no valid objection to the passage of this bill. If the railroad company believe they are entitled to land for the six-mile section of road built, then they ought to favor the bill, for under it their claims, if valid, will be duly recognized. If they are not so entitled they ought to know that they can not possibly hope to get any lands on account of such construction, for the day of land grants is passed. If this bill will not give the company the lands it desires, it will never get them. But the bill will settle the controversy that will grow more angry with each succeeding delay, and which will not cease until Congress has taken such action as will result in the final declaration of the legal status of the lands in question.

It has not been necessary to secure the prompt and cordial assent of the committee to this bill to bring into play the ordinary and inevitable sentiment prevailing among right-minded men everywhere in favor of men struggling for the possession of homes upon the public domain against the opposition of the ample capital and widespread facilities for influencing public opinion and legislation and the unscrupulous methods of a railroad corporation.

As a measure of simple justice, inspired by neither fear nor favor, the bill deserves to become a law at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall detain the Senate about ten minutes, I think, in stating this case.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to offer a resolution? If there is objection, of course it will go over until to-morrow, but I think the Senate will adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. HARRISON in the chair]. The Senator from Virginia proposes to offer a resolution, and asks for its immediate consideration. It will be read for information. The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the following resolution was presented and passed on the 4th instant, to wit: "That each Senator shall report to the Senate on Monday next the name of his private secretary;" and

Whereas an amendment was offered, accepted, and prevailed that said report should appear in the RECORD on Monday, March 8; and

Whereas but seventeen Senators report the names of their private secretaries: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be required to report to-morrow the names of the private secretaries of Senators who had certificates of appointment from his office on March 4, and the names of the Senators who had appointed them, other than those whose reports appear in the RECORD of this date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to present, for the purpose of having read, a letter bearing on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Illinois will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, now before me, that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], in some remarks made by him on the 3d of March, used the following language:

"Would it be permissible for me to intimate that while Eads was not on this floor, he has three henchmen here, two of them representing Republican journals and one a Democratic journal, coming to get information, to libel Senators on this floor whenever they can get their type and presses to work," &c.

This charge is a serious one, and, as it is utterly untrue, I hasten to meet it with an emphatic denial. I beg to assure you, in the most positive manner, and without the slightest reservation, that no representative of the press is now or has been, either directly or indirectly, authorized to speak for the ship-railway bill, or for me, upon the floor of either House of Congress, or to any member thereof, and I scorn the imputation that I would authorize or consent to any libelous assault upon a Senator who did not support a measure in which I am interested. I have not now, nor have I ever had, any person whatever employed to represent me or the ship-railway on the floor of the Senate or House, and I challenge the proof that there is any such person or any lobby in its interest either inside or outside of the Capitol. No one is or has been authorized to represent the measure in any way, except the officers of the company.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] has certainly been misinformed and grossly deceived in this matter. It is manifest that it would be a great injustice to me that such a charge should remain on the records of the Senate unsupported by any proof whatever. I therefore ask that the Senate cause the said statement of the Senator from Virginia to be thoroughly investigated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAS. B. EADS.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, United States Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire that that letter, sent to me to be presented to the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Commerce or any committee, I do not care which, with instruction that they investigate this charge, as the writer requests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator put in writing his motion or resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What is that?

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the letter be referred to a committee, I do not care which committee, according to the request of the writer.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Commerce has charge of the subject-matter.

Mr. PLATT. I should say the Committee on Privileges and Elections was the proper committee.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not care to take up the time of the Senator from Kansas. I do not fear any investigation, nor do I recognize the fact that I am bound to appear before any committee at the suggestion of Mr. Eads or anybody else. I know what I have stated here to be true, and as soon as I can get certain documents, and especially some from Saint Louis, I shall be ready to state to this Senate what I can state with documentary evidence to sustain it.

I care not to what committee that may be referred; I shall appear before none. It is this Senate that I propose to speak to. I say again that if this Senate floor is to be open to vilifiers and blackguards, it certainly ought to be open to ladies and to gentlemen. What statements I shall make and what proofs I shall introduce will be to the country at large and to this Senate with open doors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois proposes a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. PLUMB. I think under the circumstances I ought not to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. PLUMB. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of James B. Eads be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that they be instructed to thoroughly investigate the charge contained therein.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that that lie over and be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the first suggestion of the Senator from Illinois was the proper one, that the letter be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which has charge of the subject-matter.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I desired to do, but different Senators made other suggestions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over, so that no present action can be taken on it.

FRAUDULENT IMPORTATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator from Kansas to allow me to submit a resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I yield.

Mr. CONGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate for its information a certified copy of the report made to the Department by special agent O. L. Spaulding in November, 1885, relative to the charge of fraudulent importation of Chinese into the United States at the port of San Francisco; also the supplemental report regarding the same practice at Port Townsend, Wash., together with the tables accompanying each report.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, in the year 1864, the lands which are the subject of this proposed legislation were granted to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the building of a railroad from a point on the line between Minnesota and Iowa, which is the southern line of Minnesota and the northern line of Iowa, to Sioux City, on the Missouri River, in the State of Iowa, a distance of about 80 miles, perhaps 85 miles. The State of Iowa, in pursuance of an act of Congress, conferred the right to build this road upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company. The company had the right to select the point at which it would initiate its work on the line between these two States within the distances of at least 50 miles from east to west. It built 56.13 miles within the time named in the granting act.

When it began its construction a company known then as the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company had built clear across the State of Iowa, and in the progress of its building had built to the town of Le Mars and from Le Mars to Sioux City, Le Mars being northeast of Sioux City about 30 miles. That road, as I said, was completed at the time when the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company commenced its construction. The Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company built to this same town of Le Mars, in the direction of Sioux City, from the point at which it originated its work, and there stopped, and the railroad thus built, as I said, was 56.13 miles long, consisting of five sections of 10 miles each, and this fraction of 6.13 miles. The law of Congress provided that the land should be certified to the State for the benefit of the company building the railroad as the road was built in sections of 10 miles; the lands were certified to the State for the purpose of being conveyed to the company on account of the building of these 50 miles of railroad, five sections of 10 miles each, and were by the State of Iowa patented or conveyed to the railroad company; but no lands have ever been conveyed to the railroad company on account of the building of the fraction of 6.13 miles. Between 85,000 and 90,000 acres within the limits of the grant, subject to the grant, are still unconveyed. The whole controversy is as to what shall become of the lands which lie opposite to and conterminus with this fractional section of railroad and of so many lands as lie beyond the completed line of the railroad as may attach to that line as indemnity.

It was claimed on the part of the railroad company before the committee that notwithstanding the fact that they have not built a full section of 10 miles, they were entitled to lands at the same rate per mile for the building of the 6 miles that they would have received if they had built 10 miles, and they asked the committee to so legislate as to give them these lands and restore the remainder of the land to the public domain.

The controversy, therefore, as I said, is as to the lands which the company claim as belonging to them, if not by law by right, on account of having built this fractional section of road. The committee found, and it is so stated in the report, that the railroad company had the choice of location, and that it not only built to Le Mars voluntarily and therefore is in a condition only to claim that which a strict construction of the law would give it, but that when it built to Le Mars it made a contract with the connecting road whereby it ran its trains to Sioux City, thus making in one sense a through line from the south border of Minnesota to Sioux City, and it also made a contract that it would do no local business between the town of Le Mars and Sioux City, thereby destroying to that extent at least one of the main purposes that Congress had in mind in making the land grant, that is to say, to secure the construction of a railroad between the Minnesota State line and Sioux City which should be operated for the benefit of all the people living along its line as well as those persons who might live beyond either terminus or who might have business over it.

In the course of the investigation it was ascertained that the railroad company filed its map of permanent location upon a line an average of about 6 miles west of the line on which it subsequently built the road. If it had built on that line it would have gone 6 miles west of Le Mars, and therefore would not have joined the railroad of the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company at that point, but would have been necessitated to go farther north to make a connection, and probably in that event would have gone on to Sioux City and carried out the intention of the act of Congress.

Subsequently, and without any authority of Congress, the line of location was changed, or rather the road was constructed upon a line other than the one upon which the withdrawal of the lands had been made, and other than the one which it had filed originally with the Interior Department. Under the decision of the Supreme Court the committee believed that would have been an avoidance of the entire grant; but a portion of the lands having been certified to the railroad company, the committee did not deem it advisable to go into that question, but limited its action entirely to a proposition to send to the circuit court of the United States the question as to what right, if any, the railroad company had by reason of the completion of this fractional section of railroad, declaring at the same time the forfeiture and the reversionary interest of the United States for the purpose of laying a foundation for this suit.

That, as I said, is all the question there is in this bill, as I conceive, simply investing the circuit court of the United States with jurisdiction to determine what rights, if any, the railroad company has by reason of this partial performance, and in the event that the court shall decide that the railroad company has no interest by reason of such partial performance, then the lands which are claimed to pertain to that fractional section of railroad shall revert to the United States and become a part of the public domain.

The bill then provides a plan for the disposition of these lands, giving the preference to settlers, to those who are now upon them, according to the ordinary method whereby the public lands are disposed of.

I do not desire at this time to detain the Senate in a discussion of the bill. If its further discussion shall become necessary in the course of what may occur, I shall then ask to be heard. All I wanted to do now was to make a brief statement of the facts in the case as found by the committee and the embodiment of the result of that finding in the bill which has been read to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment; at the end of section 1 add:

> And said company shall be deemed to have earned and be entitled to receive 100 sections of land for each 10 miles, and ratably for fractions thereof, for each continuous portion of its road constructed in the time required by law; the facts of such construction and the quantities and description of land so earned to be ascertained under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, this matter has been before the Senate on a former occasion. At the last Congress a similar bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and the matter was discussed somewhat at that time. The Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, has stated pretty nearly as I would state myself the facts involved in the case, although in some respects I shall state facts which modify very materially his conclusions and I think should modify them in the mind of any person considering this matter fairly.

The Senator stated in his opening that the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company were authorized to construct a line of road from a point on the northern line of Iowa, being the southern line of Minnesota, to Sioux City, in Iowa, a southeasterly course. He also stated that the Sioux City company had a right to select the point on the Minnesota State line from which it would start and run to Sioux City. That is true, but there are other facts in that connection which must be stated in order to present the whole truth.

The Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company is a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota. That company was authorized by act of Congress and of the State Legislature of Minnesota to construct a line of road from Saint Paul running southwesterly to a point on the southern line of the State of Minnesota, looking to a connection between Saint Paul and Sioux City. This line in Iowa was intended as a continuation and a supplement to the line from Saint Paul to the southern boundary line of the State of Minnesota.

The great benefit which was to result to the State of Iowa from the construction of the road from Sioux City to the Iowa line was because it made a connection with the Saint Paul and Sioux City road on that line to Saint Paul. It opened up to that country a connection with the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, and brought it into communication by direct line by rail with the head of Lake Superior. The great benefit of that connection will be appreciated when it is remembered that Northwestern Iowa, Eastern Nebraska, and all that region is an agricultural country. This direct line of communication by rail from Sioux City to Saint Paul and the head of Lake Superior opened up to that country a line of transportation for all its grain and agricultural products by the waters of the lakes, the great transportation route to New York. They strike at the head of Lake Superior the great water line which communicates between the Western waters and the market at New York and all the Eastern markets. It not only did that, but it opened to all this country, and not only to this country but to the country embraced in the State of Kansas represented by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands so ably, a market to which they could go for lumber, which they needed so much in the construction of their houses, their fences, and all their building operations. It gave them a lumber market in competition with the Saint Louis market and with the Chicago market, as well as opening up all this country to the agricultural products and giving them the advantage of competition between the great water routes and the railroad lines of the country to the East.

So the Saint Paul and Sioux City road would have defeated the purpose of its creation if it had not made direct connection at the point at which the Saint Paul and Sioux City road struck the northern line of Iowa and the southern line of Minnesota. It had no choice, if it acted in good faith to the people of that country, where it would start on the northern line of Iowa; it had to start where the Saint Paul and Sioux City road terminated, and that was in a direct line between Saint Paul and Sioux City.

So while the statement of the Senator from Kansas may be literally true, that under the act of Congress it had a right to select a point on the northern line of Iowa, perhaps within a range of 50 miles, under that act, where it would start, the fact is that it was compelled in good faith and by existing circumstances to commence at the termination of the Saint Paul and Sioux City road, and the Saint Paul and Sioux City road was composed of the same persons who composed the Sioux City and Saint Paul road, and, as I stated on a former occasion, they were gentlemen who were deeply interested in the development of that country. They were men who resided in that country, whose every interest was involved in the development of the country, whose every feeling was excited and would be gratified in the development of the highest interests of all that region. They were not speculators. They never have been. They were not monopolists. They were men who devoted their money and their means to the development of their own country. They live there; they have been my neighbors; I know them, and they have devoted their whole lives to the development of that section of country, and have done it successfully. So there is here no attempt of any overgrown corporation or any monopoly to grasp the lands of the Government for work which they have not done. All that this company ask is that they may be permitted to have the amount of land specified by the act of Congress for the completion of so much of their road as has been built within the time prescribed by the act of Congress.

Mr. President, another fact is of importance. The Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad was a land-grant road under the laws of Iowa and acts of the Congress of the United States. It was authorized to build a road from Dubuque, as nearly as could be on the forty-second parallel of north latitude, to the Missouri River at a point near Sioux City. If that line had been followed it would have struck the Missouri River below Sioux City and run northward to get to that city. But in 1864, after the land grant to the Dubuque and Sioux City road was made, the company came to Congress and secured an amendment to the grant of land in the original act. In 1864 by the act approved June 2 it was provided—

> That the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company may so far change their line between Fort Dodge and Sioux City as to secure the best route between those points; said change shall not impair the right to, nor change the location of, their present land grant.

This Dubuque and Sioux City road built its line about the forty-ran second parallel of north latitude to Fort Dodge. From that point it ran in a northwesterly course to strike Le Mars, and from Le Mars turned directly southwest to go to Sioux City; so that it left its original route, which was due east, ran northwesterly to Le Mars, a point on the line of the Sioux City and Saint Paul road, and turned directly southwest to Sioux City, the terminus of the Sioux City and Saint Paul road. So, when the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company built their line to Le Mars, they struck the Dubuque and Sioux City road, which had constructed its line from Le Mars to Sioux City, directly on the route which the Sioux City and Saint Paul road would have been compelled to take had it built its line from Le Mars on down to Sioux City.

The Dubuque and Sioux City road was a land-grant road. It got all the land it was entitled to for every mile of this road coming out of the direct line on the forty-second parallel of north latitude up to Le Mars and back again to Sioux City. The land grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul road was intended to secure the line between Sioux City and Saint Paul. The land of the Government had already been used to build the Dubuque and Sioux City road. When, therefore, the Saint Paul and Sioux City road arrived at Le Mars with its line it concluded that it should stop there, because it would have had to construct its road directly along the tracks of the Dubuque and Sioux City road to have arrived at Sioux City; but it did not leave the people of the country without the road. The road was there, a land-grant road, a road under the control of the Government, a road subject to the legislation of Congress to-day; and if any such agreement has been made as is suggested by the Senator from Kansas, any contract of a character such as he has stated, the remedy is ample. But my information in regard to the fact is that there is no contract of that kind. It was neccessary, of course, to make a running arrangement between Le Mars and Sioux City, but that was all, and the Sioux City road had not left the public without ample conveniences at Sioux City for the independent transaction of all its business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Minnesota will yield, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. I simply wish to give notice that at the close of the formal morning business to-morrow I shall move to take up the bill which has just been displaced by the regular order. The Senator from Minnesota will go on to-morrow?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, I will go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall ask to resume the consideration of the bill to-morrow; and the Senator from Minnesota of course will then renew his remarks.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill which has just been laid aside, in order that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolutions reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of January 25, 1886. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions attached to the report, as follows:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring "that persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office," ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach and to give place to another who has not rendered such service is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the calm and orderly administration of a constitutional government is a subject in which the Senate, and the House of Representatives, and the President of the United States, and the people are all equally interested, and for which they are all, in their respective stations and places, equally responsible. It is in support of that calm, and orderly, and constitutional exercise of the functions of government that I now address myself to these resolutions.

It has been at least forty years since any occasion of this kind has arisen between the executive department of the Government and the Senate; and when a little more than forty years ago a similar but not the same question arose, it had then been a long time before that any such question, or any question like it, had engaged the attention of the Senate, or the House of Representatives, or the people; for the instances in which there has been evinced the slightest reluctance on the part either of the Executive or the heads of Departments to respond to the calls of either House or of their committees for papers in possession either of the Executive or of the Departments have been very few indeed. Sometimes in a case of political fever, as it might be called, there have been evinced, wide years apart, a reluctance and a hesitation on the part of the Executive or of the heads of Departments to do this thing; and then, that storm being over, the orderly administration of constitutional government went on as before, and either House of Congress on its request or demand, as the case might be, and the committees of either House of Congress acting without a direct and positive authority to send for persons and papers, have always obtained from the Departments on their mere request everything that either House or its committees thought necessary for the proper discharge of their duties.

Now again, after almost half a century, the Senate finds itself confronted by a refusal of the head of the Department of Justice to transmit copies of official papers and documents relating not to persons but to things, relating not to officers but to offices, on file in that Department.

In order that the Senate may perfectly understand how the question stands, I ask the Secretary to read section 1767 and section 1768 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the sections indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1767. Every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 1768. During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the courts of the United States, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed, in his discretion, by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and the person so designated shall take the oath and give the bond required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs the duties of such officer, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of the office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended. The President shall, within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to the same session of the Senate for the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Section 346 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

SEC. 346. There shall be at the seat of Government an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Justice, and an Attorney-General, who shall be at the head thereof.

Not the President. Section 362 of the same statutes provides:

SEC. 362. The Attorney-General shall exercise general superintendence and direction over the attorneys and marshals of all the districts in the United States and the Territories as to the manner of discharging their respective duties; and the several district attorneys and marshals are required to report to the Attorney-General an account of their official proceedings, and of the state and condition of their respective offices, in such time and manner as the Attorney-General may direct.

Section 368 provides:

SEC. 368. The Attorney-General shall exercise general supervisory powers over the accounts of district attorneys, marshals, clerks, and other officers of the courts of the United States.

Section 833 provides:

SEC. 833. Every district attorney, clerk of a district court, clerk of a circuit court, and marshal, shall, on the first days of January and July in each year, or within thirty days thereafter, make to the Attorney-General, in such form as he may prescribe, a written return for the half year ending on said days, respectively, of all the fees and emoluments of his office, of every name and character, and of all the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk-hire, together with the vouchers for the payment of the same for such last half year. He shall state separately in such returns the fees and emoluments received or payable under the bankrupt act; and every marshal shall state separately therein the fees and emoluments received or payable for services rendered by himself personally, those received or payable for services rendered by each of his deputies, naming him, and the proportion of such fees and emoluments which, by the terms of his service, each deputy is to receive. Said returns shall be verified by the oath of the officer making them

Section 349 provides:

SEC. 349. There shall be in the Department of Justice a Solicitor of the Treasury, an assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, a Solicitor of Internal Revenue, a Naval Solicitor, and an Examiner of Claims for the Department of State, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to the following salaries: The Solicitor of the Treasury to $4,000 a year, the assistant Solicitor of the Treasury to $3,000 a year, the Solicitor of Internal Revenue to $5,000 a year, the Naval Solicitor to $3,500 a year, and the Examiner of Claims for the Department of State $4,000 a year.

Then section 350 provides:

SEC. 350. The officers named in the preceding section shall exercise their functions under the supervision and control of the head of the Department of Justice.

And then follows the provision as to the appointment of clerks, &c. Section 161 provides:

SEC. 161. The head of each Department is authorized to prescribe regulations not inconsistent with law, for the government of his Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

Under the authority of these provisions the Attorney-General of the United States has made regulations, to be found in the Official Register of the Department of Justice, and the book I read from is the Register coming up to 1884, the latest copy I have. I have no doubt the regulations are the same now. I read from page 167:

On taking the oath of office, United States attorneys will immediately transmit a copy thereof to this Department. They will, at the earliest practicable period, obtain from their predecessors in office the books, papers, and other property of the United States in their hands.

Whenever a district attorney retires from office he should make a complete inventory of all books in his office belonging to the United States, taking receipts in duplicate from his successor, one of which must be sent to this Department before a final settlement of his accounts can be made.

Mr. Duskin, the district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, was appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. His commission, if I am correctly informed, read this way:

Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, diligence, and discretion of George M. Duskin, I have nominated, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate do appoint, him to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the rights, privileges, and emoluments thereunto legally appertaining unto him, the said George M. Duskin, until a successor shall have been appointed and duly qualified.

I say that that is the commission of Mr. Duskin, if I am correctly informed. I have not a copy of it. I do not know but it might have been thought, if it had been called for by the Senate, as one of those things that would bear upon the suspension of Mr. Duskin, and, therefore, not within the authority of the Senate to ask for or to receive. But I take it that that is the form of the commission from the circumstance that after the passage of the law regulating the tenure of civil offices in 1867, this form of commission was adopted by the President of the United States under the advice of the heads of his Departments for all the Departments; and it is proved in evidence as being the form adopted at that time for the government of the Departments, and I know personally in fact that it has been continued until a recent period of time as the proper method under that law of issuing commissions; and I have no doubt the same form is now in use. By this, therefore, if I am correct as to the form of the commission, it will appear that under the broad seal of the United States and the signature of its then President, this gentleman, Mr. Duskin, was authorized and empowered to perform the duties of that office until his successor should have been duly appointed and qualified.

Holding this commission, and so far as we yet know faithfully performing its duties, on the 17th day of July, 1885, the President of the United States, under the authority of the statute I have had read, suspended this gentleman by an order in these words:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., July 17, 1885.

SIR: Your are hereby suspended from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, in accordance with the terms of section 1768, Revised Statutes of the United States, and subject to all provisions of law applicable thereto.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

To GEORGE M. DUSKIN, Esq.,
United States Attorney, Mobile, Ala.

On the same day the President of the United States, pursuant to the same statute, issued this letter of authority to the designated person who was to perform the duties:

Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America, to all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that by virtue of the authority conferred upon the President by section 1768 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, I do hereby suspend George M. Duskin, of Alabama, from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, until the end of the next session of the Senate; and I hereby designate John D. Burnett, of Alabama, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time, he being a suitable person therefor, subject to all provisions of law applicable thereto.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington the 17th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1885, and of the Independence of the United States of America the 110th.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

By the President:
[SEAL.]

T. F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

In that state of things the Senate met at its regular session on the first Monday of December last, and on the 14th of that month the President sent to the Senate the nomination of the same Mr. Burnett, the designated person, in these words:

I nominate John D. Burnett, of Alabama, to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, vice George M. Duskin suspended.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

That nomination being under consideration, on the 25th of January last the Senate adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

On the 28th of January, in reply to this resolution, the Attorney-General sent to the Senate a letter, which I ask the Secretary to read, to save my voice.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, January 28, 1886.

The President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

I acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate adopted on the 25th instant, in executive session, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama."

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having already been sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question then is, Mr. President, what was the nature of this nomination that the President of the United States sent to the Senate? You will observe that he had not undertaken, in the face of a statute that forbade it, to remove Mr. Duskin from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, but pursuant to the statute and acting in terms under its authority and under no other authority, he suspended this gentleman from the performance of his duties. This gentleman remained still the attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. He stood in the attitude of a military officer under arrest, as the President of the United States to-day might place the Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States, General Sheridan; but that would not take General Sheridan out of the Army, I take it.

This act of the President, therefore, did not profess to be and was not an attempt to remove Mr. Duskin, but to withhold from him the right to perform the functions of that office until the judgment of the Senate could be taken in respect of his removal and the appointment of his successor. He takes pains, as he should, in his order of suspension and in his order of designation to state that both are subject to all the laws applicable thereto; and the preceding section of the Revised Statutes, a part of the law of 1867 and of 1869, declared in explicit terms that this man should not be removed except by the advice and consent of the Senate. It is plain, therefore, that he did not undertake to remove him, and that when the nomination of Burnett was sent to the Senate Duskin was the attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. The proposition of the nomination was that Duskin should be removed by the appointment of this selected gentleman, if it should meet with the approval of the Senate, as his successor.

That was the proposition; and therefore if the Senate of the United States were even a jury and had to submit to the judgment of the President of the United States as a judge as to what evidence should be laid before it connected with the case and its relevancy, it would have been relevant on the very issue submitted by the judge to the jury to know what was the conduct and management of that office in the hands of the person whom the President asked the Senate to assist him in displacing permanently by the appointment of a successor. That was the question. It was a question that had arisen before, not between the President and the Senate, but by the predecessors of the present President of the United States in their own councils and with their own Cabinets and under the advice of the heads of their Departments, which the Constitution of the United States authorizes them to require, as to what should be the course of the Executive in the execution of the law which has been read. So on the 4th of August, 1870, a little more than a year after the passage of the act in its present form, General Grant, then President of the United States, took the opinion of his Attorney-General in respect of the execution of the act, which I ask may be read.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, August 4, 1870.

SIR: Your letter of the 20th of July, 1870, presents the following facts:

Mr. George H. Yeaman was, by the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned on the 22d day of January, A. D. 1866, to be the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen. On the 16th day of April, 1869, Mr. C. C. Andrews was, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed and commissioned as the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen. Mr. Andrews never went to Copenhagen, but was transferred to Stockholm, and on the 3d day of June, 1869, during the recess of the Senate, a commission as minister resident at that place was issued, authorizing him to hold the office in the place of General Bartlett, suspended, until the close of the next session of the Senate. On the 15th of March, 1870, Mr. Andrews was confirmed by the Senate as minister at Stockholm, and a commission was issued to him as such.

Mr. Yeaman continued under instructions, and without interruption, to represent the United States at Copenhagen. But, in consequence of the nomination and confirmation of Mr. Andrews, a new nomination of Mr. Yeaman as minister at Copenhagen was sent to the Senate at the beginning of its late session. The Senate adjourned without acting on this nomination.

Upon these facts you address to me the following questions:

1. Whether the laws known as the tenure-of-office acts, so far as they restrain the powers of the President, are applicable to the power to appoint embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, conferred upon him by the Constitution, article 2, section 2?

2. Whether Mr. Yeaman, after the adjournment of the Senate without acting on his nomination, may be regarded as the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen and may receive compensation therefor?

3. Whether, in case it is held that Mr. Yeaman is not entitled to be so regarded, Mr. Andrews, having been confirmed by the Senate, first as minister to Denmark and then as minister to Sweden and Normay, is now entitled to be compensated for services as minister to both courts under the provisions of the act?

4. Whether, in case there is a vacancy in the mission to Denmark, the President may now appoint a minister to that place?

5. Whether, in case it is held that there is not a vacancy, the President may remove the incumbent (whether Mr. Andrews or Mr. Yeaman) and make a new appointment?

I will first answer your second question, "Whether Mr. Yeaman, after the adjournment of the Senate without acting on his nomination, may be regarded as the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen and may receive compensation therefor?"

He is the minister resident now under his original appointment, unless his functions under that appointment have been lawfully terminated. His functions have not been thus terminated, unless that result has been effected by the nomination, confirmation, and commission of Mr. Andrews in April, 1869.

When there is a succession of persons in the same office, and the accession of one is to displace the other, at what point of time does the transfer take place? This question has not been adjudicated by our highest court, but it has received a careful consideration in a circuit court of the United States, and there it was held that the new commission did not vacate the old one until it was notified to the holder of the latter. (Bonerbank vs. Morris, Wall., C. C., 119; see also Willes's Rep., 279; 2 Hale's P. C., 25.)

This was in the case of a domestic office. In the case of a similar succession in a foreign mission, there is good reason for the rule that the holder is not displaced until the successor enters upon his duties. On account of the distance of his post from the seat of government any other rule would often cause serious embarrassment, notwithstanding the means of speedy communication which we owe to modern science. And this rule is well established in practice.

I need not refer you to the numerous instances in the history of our intercourse with other powers in which a minister has remained at his foreign post for months after the nomination, confirmation, and commission of his successor, and has all the time been considered by both governments as the lawful representative of his country. The rule is recognized by the clearest implication in the act of Congress of August 18, 1856, touching the compensation of diplomatic officers, which provides that "no person shall be deemed to hold any such office after his successor shall be appointed and actually enter upon the duties of his office at his post of duty."

The various modes of terminating a diplomatic mission are well fixed in the law of nations, and the only one of them which can have any conceivable application to this case is that of recall; for a removal by the accession of another to the office is, in effect, a species of recall. When there is no personal or national misunderstanding, which is the present case, the retiring minister usually receives from his government a letter of recall, which he presents to the proper officer of the country in which he has served, and this ceremony formally closes his mission. In the case of Mr. Yeaman I am advised that no letter of recall was sent, so that he has never been displaced by this method. Mr. Andrews never having entered upon the duties of his office, his appointment must be regarded as inchoate, and not effectual to remove Mr. Yeaman.

I am not informed that Mr. Andrews asserts any claim to the office in question. No doubt he considers, and properly, that his commission to Copenhagen was vacated by the acceptance of the mission to Stockholm; for although it is not contrary to the law of nations for the same person to be charged with a diplomatic mission to more than one government, yet where the missions are both permanent and require different official residences, and where the appointing power intends no such multiplication of his functions, the acceptance of a new commission signifies that the former appointment is declined.

The nomination of Mr. Yeaman to the Senate for reappointment, though wisely made under the circumstances out of abundant caution, was, in this view, unnecessary, as he was still in the office under a valid commission.

I am, therefore, of opinion that Mr. Yeaman should be regarded as the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen and as having been such from the time that he first entered upon the duties of the office, and his right to compensation follows of course.

These views dispose of your third and fourth questions. The first I will notice at the close of this opinion.

Your fifth question is this: "Whether, in case it is held that there is not a vacancy, the President may remove the incumbent (whether Mr. Andrews or Mr. Yeaman) and make a new appointment?"

The facts of this case do not destroy or abridge the power which the President has over civil officers under the tenure-of-office acts—that is, a power to suspend the incumbent until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed in his discretion by the designation of another, to perform the duties of the suspended officer in the mean time.

Your letter also presents the following case: On the 1st day of June, 1869, during the recess of the Senate, Mr. Spaulding (consul at Honolulu) was suspended, and Mr. Adamson was designated to fill the office till the end of the next session of the Senate, and was in due course nominated to the Senate as consul. The Senate adjourned without acting on the nomination.

Upon these facts you inquire—

"1. Whether the failure to confirm Mr. Adamson restores Mr. Spaulding to the consulate?

I think it does. This answer is in conflict with the most obvious inference, from the facts that the tenure-of-office act, as passed in 1867, provided that if the Senate should not concur in the suspension the suspended officer should "forthwith resume the functions of his office," and that in the amendment of April, 1869, this provision is left out. From this omission it may be plausibly argued that Congress could not have intended the failure of the Senate to sustain the suspension to restore the suspended officer. But this argument, in my judgment, is overcome by the force of the terms used in the act. The word suspension, when applied to an office, never signifies a final removal of the officer, but only a pause in his exercise of the office. To suspend is "to debar for a time from the execution of an office." The termination of a suspension of itself restores the suspended officer.

"2. Whether in that event the President can remove Mr. Spaulding?"

I think that he can suspend him until the end of the next session of the Senate, and can designate some suitable person to perform the duties in the mean time. The restoration of Mr. Spaulding by the failure of the Senate to act upon the nomination of Mr. Adamson gives him no new rights in the office. He holds it now by the same tenure as in the previous recess, and is subject to the same sort of displacement, that is, to suspension, but not to absolute removal by the act of the President alone.

The question may arise, whether the President has a right in such cases to suspend for the original causes or is confined to new ones. Under the tenure-of-office act of March, 1867, he was required to report to the Senate his reasons for suspending and the evidence, and the Senate was required directly to concur or refuse to concur in the suspension. The amended act requires no such report from the President and no direct action by the Senate upon the suspension. As that body would not pronounce upon matters which it does not officially know, and upon which its judgment is not required by law, I do not think that its action or its failure to act upon the nomination of the proposed successor can abridge the President's freedom of judgment in the matter of suspension. He may, therefore, suspend for any causes which in his judgment are sufficient, without regard to the time when such causes began to exist.

"3. Whether the President can, in any event, fill the vacancy?"

This inquiry is substantially covered by my answer to the first.

In this opinion I have assumed that the acts known as the tenure-of-office acts are applicable to foreign ministers and consuls. The powerful reasoning of Attorney-General Cushing in 1855 (7 Opins., 186) would withdraw diplomatic and consular appointments from the operation of these statutes and from any regulation by Congress, except in the matter of compensation.

On the other hand, while the tenure-of-office bill was under discussion in Congress, it was not denied that its provisions would reach diplomatic and consular officers, and a constitutional distinction between legislative power over these and over other officers does not seem to have been recognized. Attorney-General Evarts, in an official opinion, treated the act as applicable to the case of a diplomatic officer. (12 Opins., 457.)

Regarding the question, therefore, as doubtful upon authority, and perhaps upon principle also, I have chosen in this opinion to conform to what seems to be the last judgment of Congress upon the subject, reserving for a future occasion a special and thorough consideration of the grave constitutional question involved.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. T. AKERMAN.

HON. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like now to have read the opinion of Attorney-General Devens, much shorter, on the same subject, given to the President of the United States on the 4th of October, 1877.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, October 4, 1877.

SIR: In connection with our conversation as to the duty of the President in sending in nominations to the Senate, and the effect of a failure so to do upon his part, or upon that of the Senate to act favorably thereon, I submit the following as a brief abstract of the law in relation to this subject:

Suspended officers.—By section 1768 of the Revised Statutes the President is authorized during any recess of the Senate to suspend any civil officer appointed with the consent of that body (except judges of United States courts) until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person to perform the duties of the suspended officer in the mean time. At such next session, and within thirty days after the commencement thereof, the President is, by the same section, required to nominate a person in the place of the suspended officer.

Should the Senate during such session refuse to consent to the appointment of the person so nominated, the President is required, as soon as practicable, to nominate another person for the office to the same session.

If the session should not continue thirty days, and previous to its expiration the President may have nominated no one to the Senate in place of the suspended officer, the result would be that immediately upon the termination of the session the authority of the person designated to perform the duties of the suspended officer would cease and the latter become reinstated, for in such case the office is not put in abeyance. The incumbent, however, may be again suspended by the President as before, and the result would be the same when the President has nominated some one to the Senate in place of the suspended officer, but that body adjourns without acting upon the nomination, or after refusing its assent to the appointment. (See 13 Opin., 301.)

Vacancies.—By section 1769 of the Revised Statutes, the President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate, by reason of death, or resignation, or expiration of term, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. Within thirty days after the commencement of the session, the President is, by section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, required to nominate persons to fill all vacancies in offices (excepting vacancies in offices which, in his opinion, ought not to be filled) that existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not.

If during such next session no appointment, with the consent of the Senate, should be made for the vacancy (whether it at the time be temporarily filled or not), in that case the office is to remain in abeyance until it is filled by appointment with the consent of the Senate.

Accordingly, if the session of the Senate should not last thirty days, and before its expiration no nomination to fill the vacancy may have been sent in by the President, the vacant office (whether temporarily filled or not) would be in abeyance immediately upon the termination of the session, and would so remain until, at a future session, the Senate should consent to an appointment thereto.

It will be seen that an office, the incumbent of which is merely suspended, is in no case placed in abeyance. This condition arises only where the office is vacant.

There is no duty devolved upon the President to send in nominations to the Senate in place of officers suspended or to fill vacancies unless that body shall continue in session for thirty days, although the results above stated follow if the Senate adjourns without confirming those appointed to take the place of suspended officers or to fill vacancies.

In sending in nominations to take the place of officers suspended by the President it is not necessary that any reasons for such suspension should be stated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS.

THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Thus, sir, it will be seen, in spite of sundry misleading discussions in the public press, and in spite of sundry inaccurate things stated in a message of the President of the United States to this body, and in spite of sundry inaccurate statements in the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary as to what is the case we have now to consider, that by the law as it had been placed on the statute-book, by the action of all the administrations that had existed after the law was passed, and by the action of the present President of the United States himself in obedience to it, he has invited the Senate of the United States to agree with him in removing Mr. Duskin from office by the appointment and commissioning of a successor.

That being so—and it is incapable of dispute—the question is whether, on the theory of the Attorney-General or the President of the United States or the minority of this committee, official papers in the Department of Justice bearing upon the administration of the officer that we are asked to remove are relevant to the subject. I take it there is but one answer to that, although I should say here by way of parenthesis lest I should forget it by and by, that I do not admit and I do not think any member of the Senate will admit that the question of the relevancy of official information that we think we need and call for depends upon anybody's judgment but our own. I do not think the warmest administration man on the other side would say, take it year in and year out, decade in and decade out, and century in and century out, that it is any part of the constitutional or legal or other mission of the President of the United States or any head of a Department to determine whether official information that exists in the Departments and is desired by either House of Congress is to be sent or not, according to his opinion whether it will be useful to them or relevant to their deliberations. I think I am safe in saying that.

The papers that were called for in the resolution of the Senate, as stated in that resolution, were papers that were "filed" there; and "filing" is a technical term, a term of art in law-making and in law administration. They were papers that were filed in the Department of Justice in relation, as I said a little while ago, not to any man or any officer even, but in relation to the management and conduct of an office; and in respect of such papers, the positive statute-law which has been read to you declares that the Attorney-General, and not the President of the United States, shall be the custodian, and that under his charge and in his custody they shall be held and managed and preserved.. And I might refer, if it were necessary, to another statute in respect of the proof and use of documents and papers and other things in the courts of justice, the old act of 1830 or 1840 or whatever it was, still in the Revised Statutes, that all papers not even filed in, but all the papers in any of the Departments of this Government could and should be proved in courts of justice whenever they were wanted in court for the administration of justice, by copies certified by the head or the chief clerk of that Department.

The men who made those statutes and who made these statutes to which I have referred were laboring under perhaps the delusion—but I think not—that papers which were in a Department, a public Department of the Government, must of necessity be public papers, official papers, papers relating to the administration of the affairs of that Department in some way or other; and certainly that would be true in respect of papers filed. What is an official paper, sir? It is not material to this discussion, because the Senate has not called for anything else. What is an official paper? Suppose a letter were addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, as some are every day, as you know, sir, and came to your office as President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, proceeding to state that such a public measure was useful or hurtful; would that be a private paper or a public paper, a private paper or an official paper? I take it there would be but one answer to that question. You would hardly think it within the fitness of things, I take it, that you could carry it to your house, or put it into your pocket, or put it into your fireplace and destroy it. It is addressed to you in your official character, and that is what gives character to a paper of whatever kind it is, whether official or whether private. It is true there may be official papers that are marked confidential, but they are not the less official papers.

Now I take it that out of all the papers which exist in the Department of Justice—and the report of the Attorney-General admits that there they are—there is not one of them on this subject or on any other subject that is not addressed either to the Chief Executive of the United States in his character as such, or to some head of a Department, or some officer of the Department in his character as such, and that is why they are in the Department of Justice or in any other Department. That is what gives them their character.

Mr. President, the suspension of an officer is said by the minority of the committee to be an act solely within the exclusive discretion of the President of the United States. So say the majority of the committee. But is not the suspension of a public officer an official act? The statute says it is; the President says it is. When under his seal and signature and the certificate of the Secretary of State, the attesting witness of the authenticity of the document, he suspends an officer, he does it officially. Of course he has no right to do it privately. It is the President, and not the man, that suspends the officer, and it is therefore an official act. Therefore, every paper which is addressed to the officer exercising that function, in his character as the officer exercising that function and upon that topic, must be an official paper. No matter how vile it may be, no matter how false it may be, no matter how little influence it may produce upon the mind of the officer who has to act upon it, it is not the less an official paper. It does not belong to the man, be he President, or Secretary, or Attorney-General, but it belongs to the officer in his character as an officer. I take it there can be no question of that.

The Attorney-General, it may be added—for, as I say, these remarks that I am now making are quite aside from any questions we have at present before us—the Attorney-General of the United States in his response to this resolution of the Senate makes no hint that any part of the papers there, whether called for or not called for, were private and unofficial and personal or even confidential. Public papers, official papers, were called for. Public papers, official papers, are spoken of, and only spoken of in his response. He says that these papers called for by the Senate relate exclusively to the suspension of Duskin. How relate? Do they relate to the motives of the President of the United States in suspending Duskin, do you suppose? Do you suppose the President or any of his friends had filed in the Department of Justice a statement of his motives in proceeding in the case of Duskin to perform a high, official, and important act? By no means. That would be absurd and ridiculous.

These papers, therefore, on the statement of the Attorney-General, that relate exclusively to the suspension of Duskin, must state facts, or what are alleged to be facts, regarding the conduct of that officer either in his career in doing the business that the laws of the United States impute to him, or in his career as a citizen and man, rendering him fit to be continued in his place or rendering him deserving of being put under civil arrest until his case can be considered in the way that the law has provided. That is what they must be, as we all know. Now, then, if the Senate is called upon, as it is, to assist in displacing this man permanently from his office, the very papers that exist there on the admission of the Attorney-General are papers which relate to the conduct and management of that office while he had possession of it. And yet the minority of the committee tell us that inasmuch as these papers, if they were produced, would not only give us the facts upon which we ought to act for the proposed removal of this man, but would enable us to understand the reason that the President had for exercising that high official act, therefore the Senate of the United States being called upon to pronounce judgment on the official conduct of this man, and the President of the United States having been previously called upon within his jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment upon a similar question about the same man, the Senate can not have the papers, because if they aid in the exercise of their jurisdiction it would disclose the ground upon which the President acted in the exercise of his! If that is not a proposition which would stagger the credulity and amaze the understanding of any intelligent man in a government of laws or in a government of reason, I am quite unable to comprehend what would be.

Have we got to the point where we can know nothing about the operations of this Government,—because all its operations are executive and neither House of Congress has any executive power at all; it only makes laws or the Senate advises treaties and advises appointments; all the operations of the Government are executive, every one of them; and have we come to the day that inasmuch as the President of the United States is the Chief Executive and on his constitutional responsibility must see that the laws are faithfully executed, neither House of Congress can know anything of the facts and circumstances relating to the execution of the laws, because, if they did, they might be able to comprehend the motives and reasons of the President in carrying those laws into execution? Such a statement is shocking, and yet that is the logic of the whole thing, and it is the statement of it in the letter of the Attorney-General, and in the message of the President of the United States, and in the report of the minority of this committee, that however important this official information which exists in the Department of Justice may be to knowing the truth about this case and in other cases, the truth about all others, it can not be given to a branch of the Government that is to act upon the subject, because, if given, the private motives or official motives or reasons of the Executive might be guessed at or known! That would be the end of all information; and that is the reason the Attorney-General gives, that is the reason that he concludes by saying that it would not be for the public interest, under the direction of the President, that the Senate should have these official papers.

Well, the public interest is a subject that we all profess to have a good deal of interest in. It is what we are sworn, as well as the President of the United States, to take care of. The public interest, therefore, according to this letter, will not be promoted by telling the Senate of the United States that is asked help remove this man what the truth is, lest the truth should disclose to the Senate, and possibly to the public, what were the reasons of the President of the United States in exercising an official act! Well, sir, reasons must be tremendously sacred if the facts out of which those reasons grow are never to be revealed lest they might also reveal the reasons.

In this same office, Mr. President, as you will see by the statutes and regulations which were read to you, if the successor of Duskin, the designated depositary of this office, has done his duty, in that very office of Attorney-General at the time this letter was sent to us there was formal evidence of the transfer of the office on the 17th of July, or whatever the day was, from the suspended man to the designated appointee, showing the state of its papers, the state of its property, the state of accounts, everything that related to the management and conduct of the office, a report, a statement, a paper that the statutes of the United States require and authorize the Attorney-General to have and which by his standing regulations he should have and there should be in his office. If this designated depositary of this office has done his duty, there was also within the space of time covered by this resolution of the Senate more than one official report from him to the Attorney-General, which the law commands him to make twice a year and as much oftener as the Attorney-General requires him to make it. And yet it is said that inasmuch as these official reports might disclose to the Senate and to a listening and astonished world the reasons of the President of the United States for performing an act which the statute authorizes him to perform, the truth must be withheld!

It may be also that there are reports, as there should be, within limits, from examiners of the Department of Justice that from quarter to quarter and from half year to half year proceed to the various offices of the district attorneys and marshals in the United States to inspect and examine their books, their accounts, their disbursements, their vouchers, and the general conduct and management of their offices. They are authorized by law. The Attorney-General is authorized by law to have them. He is authorized by law to regulate their official conduct and to require reports from them, which we all know they make.

Now, what do we know about the reports of these examiners? It may be that a report of one of these examiners in this case will show that the suspended man had been guilty of some dereliction of duty, some gross violation of the important trust confided to district attorneys of the United States, promoting unjust indictments, summoning unnecessary witnesses, packing juries, and so on; and yet it might interfere with the sacredness of the reasons of the President of the United States for suspending him for that cause, that the Senate should be enabled to know it when they are asked to remove him! That is the proposition.

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, if I read aright one of their propositions, seem to admit that whatever is official in the various Departments of the Government, either House of Congress in the exercise of its legitimate duties may have,—is entitled as of right to have.

The minority admit, once for all, that any and every public document—

By which I suppose they do not mean speeches of members of the the Senate and House of Representatives, necessarily or exclusively—

The minority admit, once for all, that any and every public document, paper, or record on the files of any Department, or in the possession of the President, relating to any subject whatever, over which either House of Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution, is subject to the call or inspection of either House for use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction.

That was the proposition of the majority of the committee stated in their report, and as the minority of the committee seem to agree to that proposition, it is probably unnecessary to take time to discuss the authority of either House of Congress as of right, not depending on the discretion of any head of Department, not depending upon the supervising power of the President of the United States, whatever it may be, over the heads of Departments, but depending upon an inherent and essential right in the two Houses of Congress in doing their part to carry on the Government.

But the minority say, and say rightly, that the things they are entitled to know must be things which have some relation to their jurisdiction. That is clear enough, and I think I have satisfied those who have done me the honor to give me their attention that under the law as it stands, acted upon, and executed by the President of the United States the papers that were called for do relate to a function which is to be exercised by the Senate of the United States on the invitation of the President in the removal of one man and the appointment of another.

But I should not like to leave it right there, although it is enough for the purpose of these resolutions. The jurisdiction of the Senate and the House of Representatives, composing the Congress of the United States, is just as broad, ay, even broader than that of the President of the United States. He is an officer to execute law, nothing else. The executive power is vested in a President of the United States, and he is to swear that he will faithfully see to it that the laws are executed. He is not the maker of law, he is not the maker of war or the maker of peace, without the consent of the Houses. Their jurisdiction is infinitely broader than his, and when the Constitution of the United States commanded him in affirmative terms to from time to time give Congress information of the state of the Union—he shall do it, says the Constitution—it had reference to the universal power of knowledge and information of the two Houses of Congress in respect of every operation of the Government of the United States and every one of its officers, foreign and domestic.

That is "the state of the Union." The "state of the Union" is made up of every drop in the bucket of the execution of every law and the performance of the duties of every office under the law, either within its borders or out of it. There is no one mass, no one cue, or quantity, or subject that makes up "the state of the Union," as every gentleman—and there are a good many here who have been members of the House of Representatives, when they go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—knows. It is the condition of the Government and every part of it, not only its legislative part about which the President of the United States could communicate no information without impertinence, for the Constitution has declared that the two Houses are to regulate themselves, but he is to give to Congress, as a positive command, from time to time, information on the state of the Union; and that is because they are entitled to have it, and they are entitled to have it every time they call for it, and he violates a positive command of the Constitution when on a constitutional call and in a regular way by either House he omits to do it.

That is the reason why, since the beginning of the Government, from its earliest day until now, when either House, in calling for information, feels that there may be a question as to the public interests being involved in undue and early disclosures of some confidential fact which they are entitled to know, they then usually leave it to the President to send the information just then or not according to his judgment as to whether the public interest will be preserved or injured by its being done then.

So, going more broadly than the limitation of the minority of the committee, and speaking for a government of law and a government of the people, I maintain that either House of Congress has a right to know everything that is in the Executive Departments of the Government. I will state the extremest case possible, and that is either House calling on the President or the Secretary of State for information as to the disbursement of the contingent fund for the payment of the expenses of foreign intercourse, which is ordinarily called the secret-service fund. There is the money of the people appropriated from the Treasury under a law which says that a voucher of the President of the United States shall be good with the accounting officers of the Treasury that the money has been properly expended, while in the State Department are the real vouchers which show whether the money has been expended for one purpose or another, or if there be no voucher and no money, it would show, of course, by a simple proposition in arithmetic and common sense, that it had been embezzled.

Suppose some President of the United States two or three years ago, when I believe we appropriated one or two or three hundred thousand dollars, a very large sum of money, for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, not long preceding a great political election, should have turned into the Treasury a lump voucher for that whole hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, whatever the amount was. Suppose at the next meeting of the Senate or the House of Representatives they should be of opinion that for the security of good government and as a guard against any corruption and improper use of that money it was necessary that they should know what had become it, would it be within the power of the Secretary of State or the President of the United States to say no? If so, we had better be extremely careful hereafter as to how much money we put into the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, if it is a sealed book to the two Houses of Congress. Nobody has yet ever contended that it was; and there is an instance which I shall show to you as illustrating the extremest case that can be stated, where a Democratic Senate of the United States, if that makes it any better, though I do not think it does, called for that very information, as to what sum of money and how it had been expended by a particular private and secret agent of the United States in another country, and they got it. But, to be sure, the age of reform had not come in. The improvement in public methods, so far as we have yet gone, would seem to be chiefly and most conspicuously the suppression and concealment of public papers, with the best intentions undoubtedly; but I repeat, for the first time in forty years and more, so far as I have been able to discover, has either House failed on its call to get the information that it has asked for from the public Departments of the Government.

In respect of this very instance, which illustrates the importance of standing up for this right of good government, when this resolution was sent to the Attorney-General of the United States and when his reply was made there was, I believe (I am not perfectly sure about the date), pending in another branch of Congress a bill providing for a deficiency of about $185,000 in the Department of Justice for fees of jurors and fees of witnesses, and there was there, I have no doubt, as there is here now, a letter of the Attorney-General of the United States, not sent according to the provisions of the statute through the Secretary of the Treasury as an estimate for a necessary appropriation of the public money, but under an emergency of haste that would not admit of compliance with the regular forms of law (and I make no complaint of it at all; it was perfectly right), a statement that there must be had for this current fiscal year ending on the 30th of June next, a year covering twelve months of purely Democratic control and administration, a deficiency, if I am not wrong in my recollection, of $185,000—$50,000 for jurors and $135,000 for witnesses.

If the case of Duskin, as it fairly does, illustrates the instances of all others—the district attorneys and marshals of the United States, commissioners, everything that goes to make up the autonomy of the administration of justice is an illustration—we have drawn in question, and we had drawn in question then, what has become of the money that was appropriated at the regular session to carry on the administration of justice through the Department of Justice in the United States? Duskin was one of the persons who were to draw upon that fund. He was in his district the very person whose agency more than that of any other man would go to an economical or an extravagant, a just or an unjust expenditure of the public money. Can we not know anything about it? Take the other sixty or seventy districts, whatever the number may be in the United States, that make up the aggregate of this enormous deficiency. If it is denied to us as to Duskin, it must be denied to us as to Dorsheimer; it must be denied to us as to Henry, the marshal for the State of Vermont, and every other marshal, every other district attorney. What then are we to do? Why, the President and the head of the Department of Justice, my good friend, Mr. Garland, might have said to us, if we had passed the resolution while we were acting in a legislative way, as it is called (as if there were any difference in the powers of the Senate, as if it were two bodies, whether it had its doors closed or open!)—if we had sent precisely this resolution, this very bill now before us being pending here, to the Department of Justice and applied it to all the districts in the United States, if the Attorney-General and the President are right now, they would have been right then in saying, "No; we can give you no information as to the management and conduct of those officers, either district attorneys or marshals, because if we do you may be able to know the reasons why so many of the marshals and district attorneys have been suspended, and that is a matter purely within the constitutional or legal province of the President of the United States; and therefore we will not show our hand, therefore you can not have the information." Can anybody stand up and maintain a proposition of that kind? And yet is not that the position of our good friends the minority of the committee, and their good friend and ally the President of the United States, who, with a courage which is certainly unique, has interjected his supplementary report to the report of the minority before the Senate had even considered it? If the President of the United States and the Attorney-General had been called upon they would have said "no," and there we should be.

Mr. President, is it possible to carry on a government in that way? I think not. And yet the minority say, and so does the President I believe, and so does the Attorney-General certainly, that one of the great imperfections and imprudences and usurpations of which the Senate has been guilty in this instance is that when it passed the resolution the galleries were not quite so full as they are to-day, as if the constitutional relations between the two Houses of Congress and the Executive Departments of the Government, and their respective rights to information, or the denial of it, depended upon whether one House or the other was acting at the time of its call with its doors closed and was doing one kind of business rather than another.

Sir, there are no two bodies here; there are no two jurisdictions here in the Senate. We are one body, with one jurisdiction, and whatever knowledge we get while we are discussing one thing or considering one act is equally applicable to every other subject and every other act that we may consider and do. That is clear enough; and yet, as I say, we are told that for the sole reason that these official papers and documents—and none others were called for (and it is impossible to assume that any others were called for, for the language is so clear that a simpleton who can read or write under the new bill we have passed can understand it)—may disclose the President's reasons they shall not be given, but we shall be required to proceed in the dark.

There was about fifty years ago or more a very celebrated Senator from a Southern State, as all its Senators have been celebrated, and on a similar occasion—not identical, because nothing of the kind in the way of refusal to send official information or papers happened; they were sent, but on a similar topic in executive session concerning the Panama mission—Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, upon a resolution which it was proposed the Senate should adopt for the purpose of getting possession of all the facts relating to the assembling of a congress of the South American States and the Central American States and the United States, a congress of embassadors at Panama or Mexico or some convenient place, something similar to what is now proposed in reference to the American interests, when some overzealous friends of the President apparently were opposing the resolution, said this, which will be found in the Congressional Debates of the 14th of March, 1826, volume 2, part 1, page 159:

> However gentlemen may be enamored of this new doctrine of confidence in rulers, it is not the ground, I apprehend, on which the Senate ought to act in fulfilling their constitutional duty of giving advice to the President. If we are to act by faith and not by knowledge, we have no business to be here.

I think so, too. Knowledge is denied to us, and if we act in the direction that the Attorney-General and the President desire us to act in putting through the six hundred and forty-three or six hundred and fifty removals and appointments by faith and not by knowledge, then I agree with Senator Hayne, of South Carolina, that we have no business to be here.

There is only one other thing that I wish to say at this time—I find it difficult to speak—and that is, in fairness to the gentlemen on the other side, the minority of the committee, as they say that there had been no instances of a call for papers in such a case as this being obeyed until 1867. I wish to say that taken literally that would be true, because until 1867 there was no statute of the United States that authorized the President of the United States to suspend any officer at all. It is a perfectly easy and safe proposition therefore to make that until 1867 no such case of a call for papers as this existed in which the President or the head of a Department acceded to the demand. Perhaps what they meant to say was that it had not been done in cases where the President of the United States had made a removal in the exercise of authority conferred upon him by law, for I believe every law, or nearly every law, down to 1867 in creating offices provided that they should be held at the pleasure of the President of the United States. Even the four-year office act required that the incumbents should hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. Perhaps the minority meant to say simply that when the President had exercised the power of removal which the law conferred upon him the Senate had never called upon him for the reasons for that removal with success.

Although I dare say some instances can be found, I do not remember any instance of that kind where the Senate called without success, for I think there are few instances where they called at all, and but one that could be considered as having the slightest analogy to this instance. That instance is not mentioned in the report of the minority of the committee, but it may be that it is familiar to them and that they thought, as I did, that it does not touch this case, as it does not. But I will state it.

In 1835, President Jackson, then being the Chief Executive, pursuant to the authority of law, removed a surveyor-general of the territory south of the Tennessee, a man named Wirtz, I think, in vacation, as he had a lawful right to do, and Wirtz was gone. He did not suspend him; there was no law that authorized it. He had the power to remove him, and Wirtz was out of office. He nominated one Williamson, whom he had appointed by special commission, I believe, to fill up that vacancy. The nomination of Williamson being before the Senate, the Senate passed a resolution calling upon the President for the papers and information—I do not remember the language but I will state it broad enough so that I shall not understate it—calling for the papers and information in his possession regarding the behavior of Wirtz, the man who was dead and gone and out of office. General Jackson replied in a message that was very characteristic. He said in substance that the time had come to call a halt; that that was one of the numerous calls of that nature which had been made upon him before that time by the Senate on all sorts of subjects which he had hitherto complied with, but he was going to stop now; that he had removed Mr. Wirtz in the exercise of a constitutional and legal power, and the reasons that he had for doing it were none of the Senate's business. Well, the Senate did not get the papers, if there were any. If I now state anything which does not come within the resolution of the Senate taking off the injunction of secrecy as to papers, &c., I hope the Senate will deal gently with me, as it is so long ago. The Senate the next day or the next day but one, in 1835, without a division and apparently by a unanimous vote, rejected Mr. Williamson, although in the very message of the President of the United States stating that he would not tell them anything about what Wirtz had been doing he took particular pains, at the end of the message, in the most formal way, to state that Williamson was one of the best qualified and most valuable personages he had ever known. Of course I have stated this strongly; but he urged upon the Senate a very strong commendation of Williamson. Within three days afterward Williamson had followed Wirtz into the land of the political hereafter.

That was the end of the affair between General Jackson and the Senate of the United States on the subject of papers about appointments. We all know the character of General Jackson. There was something peculiar about the Wirtz business which the public does not know and that got the old gentleman indignant; but down to that time every species of resolution touching foreign affairs of the most delicate character, touching the operations of the Army, touching rank in the Army, touching every part of administration which belongs not to the Senate but to the President, and belongs to the President just as exclusively as the power to remove or suspend does, if he had a power to remove, as he did under the law, had been passed by the Senate and answered by the President. On every other topic President Jackson, like all his predecessors and like all his successors until to-day, felt bound to and did give to both Houses of Congress every information that they ever called for, excepting as the report of the committee and as the views of the minority state the instance of General Washington, who, while a treaty was pending before the Senate of the United States between us and Great Britain, was called upon by the House of Representatives to send to them copies of the papers and information about that treaty, which he declined to do upon an obvious ground, consistently with all that I have said and which is stated in the report of the majority. That is what both Houses have done.

Now, Mr. President, if it would not take too much time, I should like as a mere matter of interest to the Senators to refer to a few of these instances.

In executive session on the 3d of March, 1806, the President was requested to report all documents and papers relative to the interference of the American minister at Paris in the case of the ship New Jersey. There was not and could not be any possible question pending in the executive session of the Senate regarding the ship New Jersey or the American minister at Paris. The Senate, of course, got the information.

On the 14th of March, 1806, in executive session, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to report the name of a certain person in some foreign country who had sold to a naval officer of the United States some peas that turned out to be unhealthful to the sailors, and some other things relating to the administration of the Navy Department under the direction of the President of the United States in a foreign country. They got that, although Thomas Jefferson was a man who stood up pretty strongly for his rights.

On the 2d of June, 1813, the President was requested to communicate copies, and did communicate copies, of the communications on the subject of the Emperor of Russia being invited to be an umpire in a controversy between us and Spain, there being pending no treaty with Spain at that time and no question, so far as I can discover from searching the Journals, being before the Senate to which that inquiry had particular relation. It was the Senate of the United States, as in these preceding cases that I have read, acting in its highest and best and broadest character of looking out for the welfare of the Union and understanding the state of the Union by running its eyes over every object of public interest that the public Departments were carrying on.

Then on the same day the President of the United States was requested to inform the Senate, and did inform the Senate, whether any communications had been received from one Russell, who was an agent of ours, admitting or denying the declaration of the Duke of Bassano as to the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. There was nothing pending about that matter in the Senate, but all students of history, as Senators are, know that on the occasion of the repeal of those decrees the time when it was first known that it was to be done was important, just as our friends in the galleries like to get very early information of what the Senate does with closed doors, or is going to do, as of the greatest possible importance. It had been stated that an agent of the United States had got that information and had given it away in an improper manner; but the detail it is quite unnecessary now to go into; and thereupon the Senate of the United States, in order, I repeat, to keep itself acquainted with the state of the Union and the executive affairs of this Government and the conduct of all its agents, proceeded to call for this information, and got it as a matter of course. It was not exercising a jurisdiction to confirm or reject Russell for anything, or to ratify or reject a treaty. It was getting information in a general way for its general purposes in the exercise of its general duty.

Then on the 30th of December, 1818, the President was requested to communicate the instructions given to the United States minister at Great Britain, a matter acting in the past, referring to diplomatic operations, which the President of the United States, as the executor of its laws and the manager of its foreign intercourse, except in the making of treaties and the appointment of officers, as much as he is the manager of the civil service of the United States or the Commander-in-Chief of its armies, and having as exclusive control over it within the limits of the law and his constitutional duty as he has over the suspension of Duskin, and much more, is called upon to give this information, and does it as a matter of duty.

On the 1st of February, 1822, the President was requested to communicate all such letters and petitions or other papers presented to him relative to the appointment of one Irish as marshal, as well those which oppose as those which request it. There was an instance which brings to my mind a suggestion in the report of the minority of the committee and the argument of their coadjutor, that in respect of all papers relating to appointments, to the fitness of persons proposed to be appointed, the Executive and the heads of the Departments cheerfully send them. Why? Do they send them as an act of grace, as one supreme power, the Queen of Great Britain, for instance, would, as an act of grace, send a copy of a paper in her foreign office to the President of the United States if he asked for it; or do they send them as a matter of duty because the body calling for them as a matter of right desires to see them? Which was it? How is it, my learned brothers on the other side of this Chamber? Do they come in that instance because it is the gracious pleasure of the President of the United States to allow us to see them, or do they come because it is his constitutional duty to send them on the request of the Senate? I say the latter. You will say the latter, of course. Very well.

Now, what is the nature of these papers? They are not addressed to the President and the Senate. We have got three or four barrels of them downstairs. They are addressed to the President of the United States and to the Attorney-General and to whomever. They are sometimes addressed to Senators, and get into the files of the Department of Justice, where they were intended to go. What are they to accomplish? They are to bear upon the mind of the appointing authority in the exercise of a jurisdiction that the Constitution gives to him exclusively, and that is to select out of the army of applicants and their friends one man whom he and he alone can select and nominate. That is his exclusive power. These papers, therefore, are just as sacred and just as private and just as confidential and just as much his own as the papers which recommended somebody else that he did not select, as the papers which accuse somebody that he is to remove of being a Republican, of having been a Union soldier, of having voted for his ticket, of having stated to his fellow-citizens that he believed that the mission of the Republican party was a good one, and that all that had been done for the good of the country in the last quarter of a century had been done by it. All those offenses are charged to him. How does it happen that one paper which relates to a subject exclusively within the control of the President, the selection of the nominee, is a paper that we are entitled to have, and that the other paper, which charges an officer that we have got under the law and who holds the commission of the President in terms until the Senate agree to remove him, is a private and confidential paper that nobody can see? I hope some day somebody will explain that. I think that I could explain it now if I wanted to do so [laughter], an explanation perhaps not within the line of the mere consideration of these resolutions upon its face. Perhaps later we may refer to it. I proceed with my citations from the Executive Journals of the Senate.

On the 13th of March, 1822, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to procure from the Secretary of State a letter of Jennings, of Indiana, recommending one Dewey for appointment as attorney of the United States for Indiana. The terms of this resolution instructing the committee to get this paper implied that the power extended to a private paper, so far as such a paper can be a private paper, referring to a letter of a private person, and not describing it as addressed to any public official, but only a letter that the Senate had reason to believe existed as a thing in the Department of State. The Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to get that letter. How did the Committee on the Judiciary get any right to obtain it, for they got it? They got that right from the authority of the Senate, did they not? In no other way. And what was the authority of the Senate to get that letter? It was in the exercise, as my friends the minority of the committee say, and say so clearly, in the exercise of an inherent jurisdiction to have the official eyes of this body see everything that existed within the marble caverns of that Department. They were brick at that time, I suppose; but the letter was got.

On the 10th of April, 1822, the Secretary of the Navy was instructed to report in what situations and for what reasons—think of the audacity of that! I notice that a very high official in a supplementary report to that of the views of the minority now before the Senate states that he has been plied (whatever that may mean) by applications of committees, &c., for reasons, and that leads me to think how audacious the Senate of the United States of 1822 must have been to have absolutely had the hardihood to order the Secretary of the Navy—very likely we had a navy then that might have battered down the Capitol if the President had only directed them to do so—to report in what situations and for what reasons acting appointments of officers are made in the Navy Department, a matter exclusively under the law within the jurisdiction of the President of the United States. The information came; the reasons were given.

On the 13th of January, 1825, the President was requested to report the instructions he had given to Mr. Rush, our minister to England, and his correspondence and the whole of it. I have only made short notice of course of those resolutions. This was at a time when there was not pending before the Senate anything that had direct reference to what Mr. Rush might have been doing in corresponding with the British minister, what he had been saying at the court of London. It was again the glance of the universal eye of the political power that the people had reposed in the two Houses of Congress over the operations of the various Departments of the Government.

On the 30th of January, 1826, the President was requested to inform the Senate whether the Government of Spain had been informed of an application made by the United States for the intervention of the Emperor of Russia, with all the correspondence, &c. There was another occasion of the same character. If the right existed at all, it existed upon the inherent ground of universal jurisdiction. The information came.

On the 15th of January, 1827, the President was requested to communicate—and he did—a copy of the credentials of Mr. Sergeant, minister to Panama, with all the other information upon the subject. That was after the Senate had voted and the House of Representatives had made the appropriation for paying the expense I believe, certainly after the Senate had voted to agree to send a minister to the congress at Panama and he had been confirmed, commissioned, and started on his journey, so that the function of the Senate as a part of the appointing power of a minister, the function of the Senate as a part of the treaty-making power, had been entirely exhausted; and only in its character as a representative of the inherent political sovereignty and freedom of the people did it call upon the President of the United States to know precisely what he, in the exercise of his discretion, not its, had told this commissioned minister to do. He gave the information. It is a pity he had not lived a little later, because he did not wish to do it.

On the 30th of April, 1828, the Secretary of War was directed to report copies of the reports of the Inspector-General of the Army of the United States, confidential as well as others, details of all statements and instructions. If we adopted the theory of the minority and the Attorney-General and the President, that there was any difference in respect of the power of the Senate when its doors were closed or when they were open, we might imagine that if such a resolution had been adopted with open doors there might have been some matter of legislation pending or to be pending in the Senate with which it might have to do; but unhappily in this case for that style of argument the Senate adopted this order in executive session. It was complied with, as a matter of course.

On the 23d of March, 1836, the President was requested to cause the Senate to be furnished with a copy of all the correspondence which took place between the Secretary of War and the delegation of the Cherokee Indians, of which John Ross was a member, between the 3d and the 15th days of March, 1835, which was given.

On the 21st of February, 1844, the President of the United States was requested to cause the following papers to be sent to the Senate at as early a day as it may be convenient to him:

"A copy of the commission by the President to Caleb Cushing, appointing him a representative of the Government of the United States in China.

"A copy of the requisition, warrant, receipt, and all other papers or documents on file in any of the Departments or in any office in either Department of the Government, touching or concerning the payment from the Treasury of the $40,000 heretofore appropriated for sending a commissioner, &c., to China, or of any part of said sum."

This was in executive session. The resolution was agreed to, and the information was sent.

On the 11th of January, 1853, Mr. Shields, of Illinois, a prominent Democrat of that day, certainly a great general, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate in executive session the correspondence of Mr. Schaumburg with the Secretary of War in relation to his claims to continuance as an officer of the Army of the United States.

What had the Senate to do with that on this theory, it being purely a matter under the Constitution and the laws for the President and the Secretary of War? And yet undoubtedly, it having been stated to some Senator that Mr. Schaumburg felt himself to have been in some way wronged, or some other person having been wronged by the appointment of Schaumburg, the Senate of the United States calls for the information which touches that subject, and it gets it.

On the 1st of June, 1870, the Senate adopted a resolution (and it got the information) calling on the President "for information touching any proposition, affair, or design of any foreign power to purchase or obtain any part of the territory of St. Domingo, or any right to the Bay of Samana," a matter entirely extraneous to anything then before the Senate, and falling within the description of information that I have described.

On the 8th of June, 1870, Mr. Sumner submitted the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate in confidence to the Senate the instructions of the Navy Department to the Navy officers in command on the coast of Dominica and Hayti, and the reports of such officers to the Navy Department from the commencement of the negotiation of the treaty with Dominica.

And the resolution was answered by General Grant immediately.

On the 12th of December, 1876, coming down to recent times, on motion of Mr. Bayard, then a distinguished Senator in this body and now the head of the Cabinet and heir-apparent to the Presidency of the United States, the Attorney-General—not this present gentleman, but one of his predecessors—was directed to inform the Senate of the total number of deputy marshals employed at the election in November, with a full statement of the causes and necessities of such employment and the object thereof. This call was complied with. On this new theory, there was a direct and violent invasion in respect of the functions and causes and reasons which the Constitution and laws had placed solely within the scope of the executive department, and yet the Senate agreed to it unanimously and the Attorney-General obeyed it immediately.

Then, on the 16th of November, 1877, going again to the Department of Justice, and going now to the administration of justice not in regard to the appointments of officers or anything else than in the mere administration of justice, the Attorney-General was called upon to report all the information, and conduct, and acts and operations about the judicial seizure of logs in some of the Southern States alleged to have been taken from the public lands of the United States, which some of the older Senators remember we had a considerable discussion about afterward when we got at the facts. What business had the Senate of the United States to invade in this instance not only the executive but the judicial department of the country to ask for the information? Where did they get the power?

On the 6th of December, 1877, another Department was called upon to give us copies of all the agreements and contracts that under the law had been made by one of the Departments with the Pacific railroads; and on the 7th of December of the same year the Department of Justice was called upon, or the President—I do not remember which, the Department of Justice I believe—to send in at once a list of all criminal prosecutions and what was being done about them in the State of South Carolina. And on the same day a report was called for of what legal impediment exists in enforcing the laws against the Pacific railroads. On the 11th of December, 1877, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to report by what authority Indians are located at Cimarron; and on the same day the President was "requested to inform the Senate, with a view to the transaction of its executive business, whether in any of the instances of nominations hitherto sent to the Senate, stated to be for appointment in place of officers removed"—as they stood in the nominations—"such removals had been made at the time of sending such nominations to the Senate." The President immediately replied:

To the Senate of the United States:

* * * In reply I would respectfully inform the Senate that in the instances referred to, removals had not been made at the time the nominations were sent to the Senate; the form used for such nominations was one found to have been in existence and heretofore used in some of the Departments, and was intended to inform the Senate that if the nominations proposed were approved, it would operate to remove an incumbent whose name was indicated.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 14, 1878.

On the 20th of December, 1878, the Secretary of the Treasury was "directed to furnish the Senate in executive session all papers in his office showing why Lieut. A. M. Devereux was removed from the Revenue-Marine Service," which order was obeyed.

On the 4th of February, 1878, the Secretary of War was directed to report copies of all papers relating to the settlements that he had made for transporting troops on a particular occasion, and on the 4th March of the same year the Secretary of the Interior was directed to report what steps had been taken for the suppresion of timber depredations in Montana; and on the 17th April of the same year, on motion of Mr. BECK, the Secretary of the Treasury was commanded to inform the Senate as to the comparative amount of the consumption of domestic and foreign articles upon which the tariff bore. Where did the Senate get authority to set the Secretary of the Treasury about any such business as that? It is almost impossible to imagine nowadays, Mr. President.

Then on the 24th of May, 1878, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to communicate a copy of a memorial regarding a rehearing in an Indian lands case in his Department, which by the law belonged exclusively to that Department and not to the Senate.

On the 15th of June, 1878, Mr. Hereford, of West Virginia, moved that the Senate order that the Secretary of the Treasury report all the amounts of money that had been paid to syndicates in the sale of the bonds of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury was directed on the 16th of December, 1878, to report the amount of deposits in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and on the 19th the Secretary of War was inquired of as to the issuance of arms on requisitions of the Departments of the Interior and Treasury and of Justice, a matter purely executive.

On the 22d of June, 1879, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to report the arrangement with the Lawrence University about Indian children. On the 8th of December, on motion of Mr. Eaton, copies of proceedings were called for regarding the Isthmus canal. On the 19th of January, 1880, the Secretary of State, on motion of Mr. Wallace, was directed to report the number and names of Spanish and American claims before the commission. On the 29th of January, on the motion of Mr. Johnston, a resolution was adopted as to the payment of the Venezuelan awards and the reasons for non-payment, and on the same day a resolution offered by Mr. VEST calling on the President for all information in regard to Max Bromberger's claim against Mexico, and on the 4th of February a resolution of Mr. Kernan directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report the reasons for order 175, as to withholding the publication of statistics of importation. On the 16th of February the Secretary of War was directed to report the names of all Army officers retired since June 18, 1878. On the 25th of February, on motion of Mr. Wallace, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to report as to the dropping of Bellows from the Navy roll.

On the 27th of February a resolution of Mr. MORGAN called for the action of the President in the payment of Mexican awards; also on the 27th of February a report was called for as to suits in New York on patent for canceling postage-stamps; on the 1st of March a report, on the motion of Mr. BECK, was called for from the Secretary of the Treasury in respect of all star-route payments. On the 11th of March, on Mr. COCKRELL's motion, copies of all patents to lands issued to Indian tribes were called for. On the 23d of March a resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of the Interior to report on patents issued to McBride, a private land case apparently. On the 6th of April a resolution passed directing the Secretary of the Navy to report the proceedings of a court-martial on Nicholson. On the 26th of April the President was requested to report a copy of dispatch 938 from the United States minister at Mexico. On the 30th the Secretary of the Interior was directed to report whether there had been any change about the rulings as to public lands. On the 13th of May the Secretary of the Interior was directed to report the correspondence on the rejection of certain bids for wagons. On the 22d of May, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report the number, kind &c., of all buildings rented by the United States. On the 27th, on a resolution offered by Mr. Pendleton, the President was requested to communicate whether any supervisor of the census appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate has been removed by him or with his consent, and whether a successor has been appointed, all of which the President then with his understanding of his duty very weakly obeyed; a direct invasion, according to our present suggestions, of the rights of the Executive. On the 28th of May, on motion of Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report in ten days copies of all papers, figures, decisions, &c., as to the tax question pending in the courts in New York between the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company and the United States.

On the 9th of January, 1879, it was—

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate in executive session the following papers, or copies of the same, now on file in the Treasury Department:

First. Charges against the Superving Inspector-General of Steamboats made by E. Platt Stratton, and dated on or about the 22d of October, 1878.

Second. The answer to said charges by the Supervising Inspector-General, and the supplemental answers, dated respectively November 16 and 18, 1878.

Third. Charges by the Supervising Inspector-General against E. P. Stratton, dated December 14, 1878.

Fourth. Report of the Supervising Inspector-General touching E. Platt Stratton, dated on or about June 21, 1878.

Fifth. Letters, telegrams, and accounts touching boiler explosions and casualties in the district of said Stratton since March, A. D. 1878.

In that connection I ought to call your attention—I seem to have mislaid the papers—to the proceedings that took place in this body on the removal of Mr. Arthur and Mr. Cornell as collector and naval officer at New York and the appointment of their successors. A resolution was offered late in the extra session, in November, 1877, calling for the papers, the charges, and all the information that bore on the subject of the proposed removal. It was almost the last day of the session. It was not acted upon. When the Senate met in regular session and these nominations were again submitted if they went over—I do not remember how that was—the President of the United States, without waiting for this resolution which had been offered and was pending in the Senate, but on the call of the Committee on Commerce, sent to the Senate his statement of the facts and circumstances and the reasons that led him to propose these removals and these changes, accompanied by a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, the present presiding officer of this body, explaining in the fullest manner (whether satisfactory or otherwise to all Senators is entirely a question apart from this) every fact and every circumstance and every reason and every argument that bore upon the public question of making a change in those offices. I think I am safe in saying that neither the President of the United States nor the Secretary of the Treasury nor any other of his advisers ever entertained the thought for a moment that it was not the right of the Senate of the United States to go to the bottom of the whole affair and have every fact and every reason that it desired to have or thought would be of any use to it in acting intelligently upon the subject.

I present next a series of original papers, resolutions, &c., and answers to them running through the '27s, and the '32s, and the '42s, and the '44s, and so on down to 1850 and 1853, covering the gap of time that is not included in these other memoranda that I have read, covering every species of information, private papers called for by express resolution of the Senate in one instance, and private papers, private letters written to the President of the United States by some minister of the United States, on a topic that the Senate thought themselves entitled to know about as to the expenditure of the secret service fund by the payment of a secret agent of the President of the United States in obtaining information and carrying on political affairs at London or in France, covering, I repeat, every variety of the functions of government, and yet none of these men, Presidents, Secretaries, Senators, supposed that one was invading the constitutional sacred privacy of the other, but all supposed that whatever they did in their official character they did as constitutional and lawful officers of the Government, and that each in the exercise of the duties that were imputed to it had a right to know all that the other knew, just as by the standing orders of this Senate the President of the United States is entitled to have extracts or the whole of every secret journal that we have.

Mr. HARRISON. And to be here too.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And to be here too, if he likes. Let me run over these instances.

On the 24th of December, 1827, President Adams, in a message to the Senate "in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, requesting a communication of the instructions to the American minister at London for the negotiation of the convention of the 13th November, 1826, with Great Britain for indemnity to the claimants under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, together with the letters of the minister accompanying and explaining the said convention," transmitted a report from the Secretary of State, together with the documents desired.

On the 29th of March, 1832, President Jackson, in a message to the Senate, transmitted a report from the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution requesting the "President to inform the Senate whether any, and if any, what communications have passed between the executive department of the United States and the executive or legislative department of the State of Maine relative to the northeastern boundary, and whether any proposition has been made by either that the boundary designated by the King of the Netherlands shall be established for a consideration to be paid to Maine; and, if so, what consideration is proposed, so far as the same may not be inconsistent with the public interest."

On the 17th of January, 1843, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Huntington, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the Senate the names of the persons who, at the time of the appointment of Thomas S. Smith to be collector of the district of Philadelphia in the place of Jonathan Roberts, removed, were employed in the custom-house in that district, as measurers, inspectors of the customs, night inspectors, gaugers, weighers, clerks, or messengers; the names of such of them as, since the appointment of said Smith, have been discharged or removed from their said offices, and the time or times of such discharge or removal; the names of such as have been appointed and employed in the said offices since said Smith entered upon the duties of his said office; the names of all persons who ordered, or requested, or advised such removals and appointments so far as known to the Department; and what agency said Smith had in the same and what reasons he assigned why such removals and appointments should be made; and also to state the time when the said Smith entered upon the duties of his said office, and to communicate to the Senate copies of all documents, papers, or letters in the Treasury Department having relation to or connected with such appointments and removals.

On the 4th of January, 1844, Mr. Benton submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence in the War Department in relation to the proceeedings and conduct of the Choctaw commission then sitting in the State of Mississippi under the Dancing Rabbit Creek treaty.

On the 13th of May, 1844, on motion of Mr. Crittenden, a resolution was adopted requesting the President to inform the Senate whether, since the commencement of the negotiations which resulted in the treaty now before the Senate for the annexation of Texas to the United States, any military preparation has been made or ordered by him for or in anticipation of war, and, if so, for what cause, and with whom was such war apprehended; and what are the preparations that have been made or ordered; has any movement or assemblage or disposition of any of the military or naval forces of the United States been made or ordered with a view to such hostilities? And to communicate to the Senate copies of all orders or directions given for any such preparation or for any such movement or disposition or for the future conduct of such military or naval forces.

On the 22d of May, 1844, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, requested the President to inform the Senate whether any engagement or agreement had taken place between the President of the United States and the President of Texas in relation to naval or military aid or any other aid to Texas in the event of an agreement on the part of Texas to annex herself to the United States; and, if so, all the particulars of such agreement or promise, with the copies of the same, if in writing, and also a copy of all communications, if any have been made, to the President of Texas, informing him of the march and sailing of portions of our Army and Navy and the orders given them to communicate with and report to the said President of Texas.

On the 28th of May, 1844, Mr. Benton submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate a copy of the instructions given in 1829 by President Jackson, through the Secretary of State, to the United States minister in Mexico to procure the retrocession or to purchase the then province of Texas and other territory between the Red River and Arkansas, ceded to Spain by the treaty of 1819.

On the 28th day of May, 1844, on motion of Mr. Benton, the Senate requested the President to communicate to the Senate the whole of the "private letter" from London, with its date, quoted by the American Secretary of State in his letter of the 9th of August, 1843, to the United States chargé in Texas, so far as the same applies to Texas; and all other letters from the same person relative to the annexation of Texas to the United States; also, that the President inform the Senate of the name of the writer of said "private letter," and whether the said writer was employed by the Government of the United States in Europe, and if so, a copy of the instructions under which he acted, or of the letters or papers which accredited him, the character in which he acted, by whom appointed, the amount of money which he received, and out of what fund it was paid.

On the 3d of June, 1844, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, requested the President to communicate to the Senate a copy of the letter from Messrs. Van Zandt and Henderson to Mr. Calhoun, calling his attention to the letter of Mr. Van Zandt of the 17th of February, 1844, to Mr. Upshur, and to which Mr. Calhoun replies in his letter of the 11th of April, 1844.

On the 3d of June, 1844, President Tyler, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 28th of May upon the subject of a "private letter" quoted in the instruction from the late Mr. Upshur to the chargé d'affaires of the United States in Texas, dated the 8th of August last, transmitted a report from the Secretary of State, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, to whom the resolution had been referred, who stated in his report that "after diligent inquiry no letter of the character referred to can be found on the files of this Department, nor any evidence that such has ever been placed on them." He is unable to ascertain the name of the writer in question from any documents in possession of the Department, and presumes that the letter referred to in the resolution of the Senate, being private, is among the private papers of the late Mr. Upshur.

On the 3d of June, 1844, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Allen, adopted a resolution requesting the President to lay before the Senate confidentially, the Senate being in executive session, a copy of any instructions which may have been given by the Executive to the American minister in England on the subject of the title to, and occupation of, the Territory of Oregon, since the 4th of March, 1841, also a copy of any correspondence which may have passed between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to that subject since that time.

On the 4th June, 1844, President Tyler, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the preceding day in executive session, requesting "a copy of a note supposed to have been addressed to the Secretary of State by the diplomatic agents of the Republic of Texas accredited to this Government," transmitted a communication from the Secretary of State, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, who reported that "no such letter as that of which the resolution requests a copy was addressed by Messrs. Van Zandt and Henderson to the Secretary of State; but in the course of the negotiation of the treaty for the annexation of Texas those gentlemen orally invited the attention of the Secretary of State to the note of Mr. Van Zandt to Mr. Upshur of the 17th of January last."

On the 7th of June, 1844, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, requested the President to inform the Senate whether Mr. Duff Green was employed by the executive government in Europe during the year 1843, and, if so, to communicate to the Senate a copy of all the correspondence of Mr. Green in relation to the annexation of Texas which may have been received from him, if any.

On the 11th of June, 1844, President Tyler, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, upon the subject of the supposed employment of Mr. Duff Green in Europe by the Executive of the United States, transmitted a communication from the Secretary of State, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, to whom it had been referred, and who reported that "there is no communication whatever, either to or from Mr. Green, in relation to the annexation of Texas to be found on the files of this Department."

On the 12th of June, 1844, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, requested the President to cause the Senate to be informed whether Mr. Duff Green has been paid any money out of the Treasury of the United States, or out of the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, for services rendered since the 4th day of March, in the year 1841, and, if so, how much; and also whether the said Mr. Duff Green has further known claims or demands for such services?

On the 17th of June, 1844, President Tyler transmitted a report from the Secretary of State, J. C. Calhoun, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, which proceeds to say: "Although the contingent fund for foreign intercourse has, for all past time, been placed at the disposal of the President, to be expended for the purposes contemplated by the fund, without any requisition upon him for a disclosure of the names of persons employed by him, the objects of their employment, or the amount paid to any particular person, and although any such disclosures might, in many instances, disappoint the objects contemplated by the appropriation of that fund, yet, in this particular instance I feel no desire to withhold the fact that Mr. Duff Green was employed by the Executive to collect such information from private or other sources as was deemed important to assist the Executive in undertaking a negotiation then contemplated, but afterward abandoned, upon an important subject, and that there was paid to him through the hands of the then Secretary of State $1,000 in full for all such service. It is proper to say that Mr. Green afterward presented a claim for an additional allowance, which has been neither allowed nor recognized as correct."

The report of the Secretary of State, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, referred to in the foregoing message, after reciting the resolution of the Senate, proceeds to say that—

> The amount of expenditures paid out of the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse from the 1st of December, 1840, to the 1st of December, 1843, together with the names of the individuals to whom the payments were made, as well as the objects of such payments, may be seen by reference to the letter of the Secretary of State to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated December 9, 1841 (Doc. No. 4, State Department), and a report made by the undersigned to the chairman of the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State (in answer to resolution of the House of Representatives), dated April 8, 1844 (Rep. No. 484, House of Reps.). From these documents it appears that on the 3d day of November, 1841, there was paid to Mr. Duff Green, out of the funds for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, the sum of $500, as bearer of dispatches to London and Paris. And again, on the 9th day of December, 1842, there was paid to the same individual, out of the same fund, the sum of $500 for expenses and compensation as bearer of dispatches to London. These items include all the payments which appear from the files of this Department to have been made to Mr. Duff Green from the 1st day of December, 1840, to the 1st day of December, 1843, and since this last date it does not appear that any amount has been paid by this Department to the said Green, nor any evidence on its files that he has or holds further claims or demands for services against it.

On the 27th of August, 1850, the Postmaster-General, N. K. Hall, communicated to the Senate as follows:

> In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, passed in executive session on the 14th instant, requesting the Postmaster-General "to furnish the Senate in executive session copies of all charges filed in his Department against the deputy postmaster at the city of Milwaukee, State of Wisconsin, before or since his appointment to that office," I have the honor to transmit herewith the accompanying papers, marked "A A," "A," and "B," which are copies of papers on file in this Department containing charges against the deputy postmaster referred to in the resolution of the Senate.
> I also transmit the accompanying papers, marked "C," "D," "E," and "F," being copies of papers now on file which are presumed to have been filed in connection with such charges, or with other charges which have been since withdrawn from the files of the Department.
> I also transmit the accompanying papers, marked "G" and "H," being copies of papers now on file, from which it will appear that certain charges heretofore made against such deputy postmaster have been withdrawn from the files of this Department.

On the 12th of February, 1853, the Secretary of War, C. M. Conrad, communicated to the Senate as follows:

> In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, passed on the 11th ultimo in executive session, I have the honor to transmit herewith the correspondence of Mr. James W. Schaumburg with this Department, since I have been connected with it, in relation to his claims to continuance as an officer of the Army.

Now, Mr. President, one other thing and I shall have done. The minority of the committee has done us the honor to say, and has said truly—I will not take the time to read it now—that no such spectacle as this happened during the time that the Democrats were in possession of the Senate, from March 4, 1879, to March 4, 1881. And the President of the United States, in his supplementary minority report in the deliberations of this body, has stated with an affluence of rhetoric which is as charming as it is unique, that this statute of the United States and the practice under it had now for many years fallen into a state of "innocuous desuetude." If that were true, it would be one of the means of the President of the United States in discharging the duty that the Constitution imputes to him to take that statute out of its disuse—if I may use a shorter and humbler phrase—and, as he is sworn to do, put it into faithful execution. Well, he has done it if it was in disuse before, but let us see. The amendment to it was passed in 1869. The effect of that amendment has been stated in the opinions of two Attorneys-General under two different administrations. It has been stated in the courts. It is not open to dispute on the face of the statute; it is not open to claim that anybody in this end of the Capitol or at the other end of the Avenue misunderstood its meaning. The Senate of the United States, believing that it had voted right when it passed it in the days of Andrew Johnson, believed it would be wrong if it repealed it in the days of Ulysses S. Grant, because the Senate voted for it on a solid principle. There was a committee of conference and the phraseology was changed. As you see, the President was still required to report within the first thirty days his nominations but not his reasons for his suspensions. That was left to the ordinary operations of the Government. He could have his own reasons. If they were satisfactory to him, it was enough for the performance of his duty. When it came to the action of the Senate, it was not the question of his reasons for suspensions, it was the question of the facts on which the officer was to be removed and the other appointed.

So the then President of the United States understood it as you see by the opinions of his Attorneys-General given to him; so he acted, and at every session of Congress from that day until he ceased to be President; within the first thirty days of the Senate's session, and according to the letter and spirit of the law—for he was an honest President—he sent to the Senate his nominations, the statement of his suspensions, and the proposition to remove the suspended officers, except as happened in two or three cases that I remember of gentlemen where he found that he had made a mistake in the suspension of and revoked it without sending a proposition for the removal of the officer to the Senate at all. What happened in the Senate? The Committee on the Judiciary—which is the only one of which I speak here, as we are the only one now on trial apparently—the Committee on the Judiciary from the time of the passage of that act, as I may state also for all time before as I have found on examination of old papers in the Secretary's office, had been in the habit in respect of appointments of calling on the Attorney-General for all the information that he had, and when it came to the law respecting removals as well as appointments calling for everything regarding proposed removals and suspensions, and accordingly from the time General Grant came in down to this present day the Committee on the Judiciary has had a regular practice that has proceeded without exception, as well when my honored friend Senator Thurman was its chairman in the two years of Democratic ascendency in this body as when I was chairman and as when Judge Trumbull was chairman before me of the Committee on the Judiciary, it never acted upon a nomination or on a removal that it had not personal knowledge about from some member of the committee—and so it seemed to be a pure waste of time—without sending to the Attorney-General for all the papers and information that bore upon that subject, whether it was a removal or a nomination. That was its standing order. It is no new thing, no new practice. No new authority; no change on the incoming of this administration has taken place.

The minority of the committee say that no such spectacle as the Judiciary Committee is presenting to an astonished world and to an astonished and injured President and Attorney-General happened in the Democratic times. Let us see. On the 4th of March, 1879, the Democrats had a majority of this body. Their Committee on the Judiciary was: Chairman, Mr. Thurman; Mr. McDonald, of Indiana; Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, now Secretary of State; Mr. Garland, of Arkansas, the present Attorney-General; Mr. Lamar, of Mississippi, the present Secretary of the Interior; Judge Davis, of Illinois; Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Conkling, and Mr. Carpenter. I have stated what the practice of the committee had been in the time I had had the honor to be its chairman.

On the 24th of March, 1879, immediately after the formation of this committee, I find what I propose to read in the committee letter-copy-book. I do not know but that it is private and confidential, but I will take the liberty of reading it even if it gets to the ears of the Attorney-General and the President of the United States. On the 24th of March of that year sundry nominations came in to fill vacancies; and Judge Thurman—and here is a copy of his bold autograph—says:

> The honorable the ATTORNEY-GENERAL:
> SIR: I am directed by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary to respectfully request that you will furnish to said committee such information as may be in the possession of your Department concerning the following nominations, together with any suggestions you may be pleased to make, namely.

Then he states them. All these were to fill vacancies. On the 7th of April, 1879, there came in a horse of a different color, the same kind of animal that we have here now, and accordingly on that day this letter was written to the Attorney-General:

APRIL 7, 1879.

SIR: Under the direction of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate I have the honor to request that you will communicate to the committee any papers or information in your possession touching the question of the propriety of the removal of Michael Shaeffer, chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and the appointment of David T. Corbin to that office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. THURMAN, Chairman.

The Hon. ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

Alas, for the Democracy of those days! Think, sir, of the infinite idocy, unpatriotism, usurpation of that number of five Senators of the United States of the Democratic party assailing a Republican Attorney-General and a Republican President with the insulting and impertinent inquiry as to papers and information touching a man, to be removed whose successor was nominated to accomplish his removal. And yet those men were in their day and in those times among the head-lights of the Democratic locomotives. There was Thurman—his light is put out—the greatest Democrat in the United States [applause in the galleries] and the best one, and the noblest one, and the bravest one, for he had the courage not long ago in your State, sir, to denounce the Democratic frauds on the ballot. There was Thurman, and there was Joe McDonald, a name familiar in the West as well as in the East as the embodiment of upright Democratic pluck and constitutional law; and there was Garland, whom we all knew here, the leader on the Democratic side of the Senate, and running over with constitutional and statute and reported law, knowing his rights as a Senator and as a member of the committee and knowing his duties; and Lamar, and then all the rest of us on this side, joining in what the present President of the United States calls an impertinent invasion of his rights in asking for information from him. Sir, if I were going to be rhetorical, I should say just here,

O shame! where is thy blush?

That is not the only instance, sir. In every instance in those two years when there came before that committee any suspension or proposed removal in session time that same chairman, with the unanimous consent of all its members, as it had been in all the years before, called for this information and got it.

Under these circumstances it does not appear to me that we can fail to get these papers upon the ground that the statute has become obsolete, gone into a state of "innocuous desuetude." Why, the President of the United States himself has invigorated it by taking it into his own hands and holding it up in the presence of the people of the United States six hundred and forty-three times in six months. He has sent to the Senate of the United States six hundred and forty-three propositions in obedience to that law. I take it, therefore, it is in force. And as my friend from Massachusetts states, it is the statute most frequently acted upon in the intercourse of the Departments of the Government with the Senate of any other in the whole history of the United States, because it relates to a state of circumstances that must frequently come into operation, the change of officers and offices for one reason and another and their suspension. And yet that is the one statute of all those of the United States that the President of the United States seems to be under the impression has fallen into such a state of disuse that nobody is bound to regard it, although he himself has, as he was bound to do by his oath, regarded it in every form and in every particular.

This is all I wish to say now.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if it would be more convenient to him to proceed with this debate to-morrow than to proceed at this late hour of the evening.

Mr. PUGH. I am ready now to answer the speech of the Senator from Vermont; but if I commenced to do so I should keep the Senate beyond the usual hour of adjournment, and I should dislike very much to address the Senate after they have been here four hours. I should prefer to have the debate go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. BEACH, the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as related to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

ALTERATION AND REPAIR OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Supervising Architect, and recommending special appropriations for alteration and repairs of certain public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORT DOUGLAS, UTAH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate for the enlargement of Fort Douglas, Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES AND PUBLIC DEBT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Register of the Treasury, with statements of receipts and expenditures of the Government from 1855 to 1885 and of the public debt from 1791 to 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT ARTILLERY BATTERIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Capt. E. R. Warner, Third Artillery, recommending that the present defective organization of light artillery batteries be remedied; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY RESERVATION, SAN ANTONIO, TEX.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the commanding general of the Department of Texas, with a petition asking permission to extend a street in San Antonio, Tex., through the military reservation at that city; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROUTES FOR HENNEPIN CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers of additional surveys by Thomas H. Handbury of routes for the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF SANTEE RIVER, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a request of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, letters from the Chief of Engineers in regard to the improvement of the Santee River, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

THE RETIRED-LIST OF THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to the resolution of the House, a list of the officers of the retired-list of the Navy February 24, 1886, with a statement showing the relative rank of each officer, date of retirement, annual pay, and reasons for retirement; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting certain papers in response to a resolution of the House calling for information in relation to the Norfolk navy-yard.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, if it be in order, I request that this communication of the Secretary of the Navy and the accompanying documents, if they are what I suppose them to be, may be printed and lie on the Speaker's table, in order that I may be able at the first opportunity to submit some remarks which I desire to make to establish my belief that the substantial allegations made in the resolutions submitted by me are sustained by those documents, and that sections 1754 and 1546 of the Revised Statutes have been, as alleged, habitually violated at the Norfolk navy-yard during the last year.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House requires that the communication be presented by the Chair and referred to the appropriate committee; but by unanimous consent the order which the gentleman asks may be made.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

Mr. EDEN. I object. Let it take its regular course.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by several gentlemen. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I shall take the first opportunity I may be able to obtain to submit some remarks on this question.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

ELI TAVERNER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of that court dismissing the case of Eli Taverner vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WILLIAM PORTER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of that court dismissing the case of William Porter vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JOHN VANTRUSE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of that court dismissing the case of John Vantruse vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committeee on War Claims.

JOHN W. DEMORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of that court dismissing the case of John W. Demory vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

REPORT ON PILOTAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Select Committee on Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests ask that there may be a reprint of report No. 838 in relation to pilotage, as the edition heretofore printed has been exhausted. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Education.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules of the House this bill will not be printed unless an order to that effect may be made. As it is an important bill perhaps the House——

Mr. SPRINGER. Has it not been already printed by the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The bill as passed by the Senate has not been printed, and without a special order of the House it will not be printed here until reported back from the House Committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed.

Mr. REAGAN. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall object to the reprinting of the bill until the committee acts upon it and reports it back.

JULIA DENT GRANT AND WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 46) accepting from Julia Dent Grant and William H. Vanderbilt objects of value and art presented by various foreign governments to the late General Ulysses S. Grant; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GROUT, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers filed by George W. Kingsbury in support of House bill 3805 and House bill 5194, reported adversely in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. WADE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John C. Geyer.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'HARA, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. GOFF, for three days.

To Mr. BLANCHARD, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GUENTHER, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURLEIGH, for one week, on account of important business.

REPORT OF PUBLIC LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 18) for the further distribution of the report of the Public Land Commission; and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the provisions of joint resolutions approved August 7, 1882, and June 27, 1884, limiting the time for the gratuitous distribution of the Codified Land Laws and History of the Public Domain, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to distribute copies remaining to the credit of any member of Congress upon the order of said member.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution; and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIE S. HOWARD.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back favorably the following resolution, with a statement that Willie S. Howard had been employed during the Forty-eighth Congress in the position indicated:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ Willie S. Howard as a page in the subcommittee-room of the Committee on Appropriations during the residue of the present session; the said Willie S. Howard to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation as now received by pages of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 21.

Mr. REAGAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum having been made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. REAGAN and Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 31.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the point of no quorum, as the majority are evidently in favor of making a lazar-house of Congress.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

DANIEL S. LOY.

Mr. COMSTOCK, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4025) for the relief of Daniel S. Loy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY S. COHN.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 917) for the relief of Henry S. Cohn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 5519) for the relief of Frederick Klor; and

A bill (H. R. 3515) for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieut. Francis Ware, deceased.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL.

Mr. SMALLS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1800) for the relief of David W. Stockstill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF GREGORY JARRATT.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 2362) for the relief of the estate of Gregory Jarratt, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 16) for the relief of J. A. Wilson, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Gregory Jarratt, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3400) to protect the bottlers of the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 1613) to amend an act creating the office of steam-boiler inspector for the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 73) authorizing the printing of committee reports; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SWINBURNE, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, reported back with amendments a resolution extending the investigations of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics to all public buildings owned or occupied by the Government in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Some time ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 5135) to classify labor and equalize the pay of employés under the Government of the United States, and had it referred to the Committee on Labor. I find that yesterday morning, without any notice to me, that bill was reported back to this House from that committee, and that they asked that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform. I wish to know if a motion now to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would not. Under the rules of the House a bill can not be brought back from a committee to which it has been referred by a reconsideration of the vote referring it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then I ask unanimous consent to recall that bill from the Committee on Civil Service Reform and restore it to the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That matter was considered by the Committee on Labor, and they thought the reference perfectly proper. I must object.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ERMENTROUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 785) for the relief of William S. Hall; and

A bill (H. R. 564) for the relief of John Lookabaugh.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILWAYS AND TELEGRAPH LINES.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at seven minutes past 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Pacific Railroads, the unfinished business reported by that committee being the bill (H. R. 5874) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has forty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CRISP. I endeavored on yesterday morning to make plain to the House the present law in respect to the lands granted to these Pacific railroads. I endeavored also to show to the House the evils that had arisen under existing law, so that the necessity might appear for some change. This morning I shall invite the attention of the House, for a short time only, to the various propositions that have been submitted to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, looking to a remedy for the evils that are universally conceded to exist. I shall call attention to the remedy recommended by the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and then I shall, if there be no gentleman who desires to oppose the proposition, ask that a vote may be taken upon it, so that if possible the bill may be disposed of during the hour that we are allowed to-day.

One proposition that has been submitted is to provide that the railway companies shall pay this cost within a given time, or, in default thereof, shall forfeit all right to the lands granted under the original act. Your committee, Mr. Speaker, have not thought it wise, have not thought it prudent to adopt that as a remedy for the existing evil. In the first place, it is a very harsh remedy. In the second place, it is of doubtful legality. If we were dealing solely with the companies, if there were no third persons who had acquired rights under existing laws, even then it would be of doubtful legality; but when we consider the fact that all of these lands, by the express assent of the Government, have been mortgaged; that money has been loaned upon them; that, with our assent, a lien has been put upon them; then, I say the legality of the proposition is more doubtful, and it is unnecessary, and I suggest improper, to invoke a remedy of that character when we can find another as ample, as complete, and as to which there is and can be no objection on the score of legality. The remedy proposed by the committee is incorporated in the bill which is now before us.

That bill is somewhat lengthy; it is somewhat technical—necessarily so, by reason of the technicality of our land laws. The gist of it, however, may be easily explained. The companies are required, within ninety days after the passage of this act, or within sixty days after the filing in the respective land offices in the districts where the lands lie, of plats of the townships embracing the lands—within that time the companies are required to select the lands they are entitled to, and to pay the cost of surveying and conveying those lands. Your committee apprehend that there will be no great trouble in making such selection. The plats will be filed in the public offices; they will contain a survey of all the lands within the limits of the grant, and it will be an easy matter for the railway companies to go into those offices and select the odd-numbered sections to which they are entitled under the law. In the event that the railway companies shall fail to discharge that duty, then we provide that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to notify each of the companies of the amount of land which they are entitled to patent under the law, and of the amount of money they are required to pay into the Treasury for the cost of selecting, surveying, and conveying the same, and provide that if any company does not within sixty days thereafter pay such sum into the Treasury of the United States, it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to institute suit in a circuit court having jurisdiction of the question, to compel the company to pay the amount that is found due to the United States.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a plain remedy. It is such a remedy as would be used by one individual against another. It is such a remedy as seems to your committee to be complete, and at the same time not to be liable to the objection on the part of the railway companies that we are blending together our rights as a creditor and our rights as a Government and using it to their hurt. Therefore your committee prefer that remedy, and recommend that it be adopted instead of the remedy of forfeiture. In this regard permit me to say further that in the Forty-eighth Congress your Committee on Pacific Railroads reported a bill providing for the collection of this money by suit. The House of Representatives amended that bill so as to provide that the remedy should be forfeiture of the lands if payment was not made within the time prescribed. In that shape the bill passed. It went to the Senate. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and that body adopted the plan which was suggested by the House Committee on Pacific Railroads instead of the plan adopted by the House itself.

I may be permitted to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Pacific Railroads, specially charged with the investigation of the question, and viewing it in every light in which it might be presented, was perhaps likely to devise a plan which would be more equitable and just than any that might be adopted by the House without consideration by a committee and put upon the bill after merely a half or three-quarters of an hour of debate. It is exceedingly desirable to this Government and to the government of the States where these lands lie that this question should be settled. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when we come to consider the proposition before us it seems to me that it is neither undignified nor unseemly in us to favor, if we can conscientiously do so, a plan that is likely to receive the assent of the other branch of the legislative department of this Government. I would not be understood as saying that the House of Representatives should surrender a conviction formed upon investigation because the legislative body at the other end of the Capitol might not agree with them. I do mean to be understood as saying that where two remedies are presented, either of which might be satisfactory, either of which might accomplish what we all have in view, it is only right and proper to choose that one which meets the approval, or is most likely to meet the approval, of the other branch of the Legislature.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. Will the passage of this bill, in your opinion, render the railway companies any less able than they would otherwise be to make payments on their indebtedness to the Government?

Mr. CRISP. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this bill would impair to any extent whatever the ability of the railroad companies to pay the debt that they owe to the Government. The Government of the United States has no lien whatever upon this land except for cost of survey, which we are now trying to collect. The land has been mortgaged with the assent of the Government for some $10,000,000, and the Government can in no event have any lien upon this land except for the cost of survey.

Mr. DUNN. And the Government gets nothing for the sinking fund out of the proceeds of the sale of the land.

Mr. CRISP. Nothing whatever. It not only gets nothing, but the proceeds of the sale of the land are not counted as part of the net income of the railroad companies so as to increase the amount coming into the Treasury under the Thurman act. This money is entirely excluded from appropriation in that way, and goes to the payment of the indebtedness which we have agreed they might incur upon those lands.

Mr. DUNN. It goes to the payment of the land bonds entirely.

Mr. CRISP. Therefore I think, Mr. Speaker, there can be objection—at least there should be no objection—to this feature of the proposed remedy.

I now come to consider for a few moments the other feature of the remedy proposed. As I said yesterday, these lands can not be taxed by the States and Territories where they lie for the reason that the legal title to them is in the Federal Government. The legal title is in the Federal Government for one purpose only, that is to secure the payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands. We have no other right, we have no other lien.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. If these companies were obliged to pay the taxes which would be due to the States upon these lands, would or would not that be deducted from the gross earnings, and thereby diminish the 25 per cent. which the companies have to pay to the Government of the United States on their indebtedness?

Mr. CRISP. I do not understand that any expense which might be incurred by these railroad companies in respect of these lands—which, bear in mind, are no part of the railway, are not incident to the railway, are not used by the railroad company as a part of its road—I do not understand that any expense incurred in connection with these lands or any income derived from them affects one way or another the interests of the United States.

Mr. DUNN. If it does, it has no right to do so.

Mr. CRISP. If I understand the question, these railroad companies stand in exactly the same position as an individual owning property. This land is not connected at all with their franchise. It is not necessary, for instance, in order to run a railroad, that the company should own other lands. It is a pure subsidy, disconnected entirely with the uses of the franchise. It is a bounty given to them by the Government to induce them to build the railroad; and when the road is built the lands are no more necessary to the uses of the road than any other species of property might be.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Yesterday the gentleman stated that it was the amendatory act of 1864 that required the railroad companies to pay the expense of surveying and selecting.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The gentleman stated further that in the original or the amendatory act there was a provision that the land not disposed of at the end of three years should be subject to entry at the land offices for homesteads.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Now, there being no time fixed within which the survey and selection should be made, would it not be held by any court that this must be done within a reasonable time; and could that reasonable time extend beyond the time within which the company must exercise its power of sale over that land; that is, three years? If these questions be answered as I think they must be, then these companies have escaped taxation for sixteen years since that reasonable time has elapsed; and ought not their lands to be forfeited?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I have approached this question—and I believe the Committee on Pacific Railroads has approached it—purely as a business proposition. In the determination of it we have not invoked any considerations with reference to the past conduct of these companies, which is considered so reprehensible by many, except their conduct in respect to the particular subject on which we propose to legislate. We have not proposed to put upon them any penalty for the past. We have doubted our right to do this; we have not felt that in an earnest, honest effort to correct abuses in the future we should embarrass ourselves by an effort to punish for abuses in the past. We consider the remedy now proposed as effectual, as complete as the remedy of forfeiture. The end and aim of both would be to collect the costs, and that would be as promptly and satisfactorily done—and I submit sooner done—by suit than by forfeiture.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Is there any provision in the bill by which this land will be subject to taxation if there should be delay in collecting the costs of surveying and locating?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I was just coming to that feature of the bill. In view of the fact that there might be some delay in the collection of the amount due to the United States, your committee, following the example of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, have undertaken to provide a particular remedy for the evil which has existed in reference to immunity from taxation. If the gentleman from Nebraska will examine the bill he will find it provides that as soon as these lands shall be surveyed by the Government, and they have nearly all been surveyed, more than six-sevenths of them have been, they may be taxed by the States and Territories in which they lie, notwithstanding the patent has not issued from the Government of the United States.

You will find in the bill provision that the lien of the United States upon these lands fixed now by a retention of the titles shall be a first lien, and that the purchaser at the tax sale can only get a patent from the United States by paying to it the cost of survey and selection of the particular tract which he buys. In other words, we give the right to tax—but I will not say that, because I do not like to talk of the United States Government granting the right to the States to tax, so I will use another term—in other words, we waive our right to immunity from taxation, conditionally. The State may impose the tax, and the State may enforce the tax by sale of the land, but the cost due to the United States is the first lien on the land, and the purchaser gets no title until he pays to the United States the cost of survey of that particul r tract.

Mr. LONG. Has he his remedy over against the railroad for what he buys?

Mr. CRISP. There is no provision of that sort.

Several MEMBERS. Then the railroad gets the land.

Mr. CRISP. If it is assessed as the property of the railroad and sold, the railroad's right is sold; that is, the right to the land with the burden of cost of survey. The purchaser gets their right but does not get our patent until he pays the cost, which the railroad ought to have paid.

We have restricted to some extent this waiver of our right to immunity from taxation. Gentlemen who live in the Western country understand there are large tracts of country not included in organized counties. Generally the law of these States requires there shall be a certain number of inhabitants within a certain area before they can organize into counties. This bill provides that land in unorganized counties shall not be taxed until we have collected our money. Whenever we have collected our money the right to tax is an inherent and sovereign right in the States and Territories where the land lies, and we have no right to claim for them immunity from taxation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Why should not unorganized counties contribute to your revenue so long as they lie adjacent to organized counties which are required to pay revenue?

Mr. CRISP. I will say that in the same spirit of fairness with which this committee has undertaken to meet this question, we have excluded the unorganized counties, because, as we understand it, a territory large enough to make twenty counties may be attached for taxing purposes to one county, we did not believe it was exactly just that the owners of that vast territory should be required to pay a tax which would be appropriated to building school-houses, to teaching the children, in a place and in a territory where they would never be of value to the owners of this land. You understand the proposition: Individuals pay taxes to support schools, to build court-houses, to build school-houses, and they are supposed to get compensation for their outlay in the proximity of such institutions to them. They are near the court-houses and near the school-houses. The vast unorganized tracts can derive no benefit from any tax imposed on them for the benefit, for instance, of a county which may be 200 miles from the people, and therefore we have felt until we collected our money we would reserve the rights we now have in unorganized counties. As soon as they have sufficient population to organize into counties then, Mr. Speaker, the law operates at once, and it seems to me the rule we have adopted in that respect will prevent injustice.

Mr. COBB. I should like to propound a question to the gentleman from Georgia if he will permit me.

Mr. CRISP. I will be willing to answer any question, but I fear my time is nearly out. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eighteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CRISP. Very well; then I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. COBB. I understand this bill goes on the general ground that the title to these lands is not in this railroad corporation; that is the legal title.

Mr. CRISP. The Supreme Court has so held.

Mr. COBB. That decision seems to be in conflict with the ruling of the Supreme Court in cases which have preceded it; for instance in the case of Schulenburg vs. Herriman. There the Supreme Court holds these grants are grants in præsenti, and the title passes——

Mr. CRISP. With condition precedent, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to suggest it.

Mr. COBB. No, sir. In the case of Schulenburg vs. Herriman the Supreme Court holds these are conditions subsequent and not precedent, and that the title passes at once.

Mr. CRISP. In this case there is an express condition precedent to the vesting of the title, because the act says the title shall not pass until they pay the costs.

Mr. COBB. That is the position I was getting at. I have not examined the statutes in the case now before us and therefore asked the gentleman for information. Of course, if the statute makes that condition it would be necessarily precedent to the vesting of the title and would bring the question within the line of argument submitted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Yes; it is very clear. There is no question about it; the Supreme Court in the case of Prescott, to which I can refer the gentleman, rendered a decision covering expressly that ground in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to interrupt him a moment to ask a question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill if it becomes a law would be the second of the amendatory acts touching the original grants to the Union Pacific system. In the first act it was deemed important to avoid, if possible, the question being raised as to the power of Congress to amend the acts, either that of 1862 or the act of 1864. I wish to inquire if it would not meet the approval of the gentleman from Georgia, as a matter of prudence, to attach to this a provision——

Mr. CRISP. Reserving the right to amend?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; reserving the right to amend the act.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will you offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection. If the gentleman will submit an amendment it will meet my concurrence.

I desire to say that in this case the committee have carefully preserved all of the rights of the United States. They have expressly provided that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to relieve the railway companies of any forfeiture that may be now or hereafter incurred. While it is true that there can be no forfeiture in this case, because the companies earned the lands as far back as 1869, yet, out of abundant caution, we have ingrafted a provision in the bill providing that nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve them of any forfeiture that may have been incurred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire, if it is the wish of the House—because it is very important that this bill should be passed without delay—to have a vote on it within the hour; and if there be no desire to debate the question further, I shall ask the previous question upon the bill and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I have the amendment prepared.

Mr. CRISP. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia ask the previous question upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as well?

Mr. CRISP. I will hear the amendment read for information first.

The SPEAKER. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed or taken in any wise to affect or impair the right of Congress at any time hereafter further to alter, amend, or repeal the said acts hereinbefore mentioned, as in the opinion of Congress justice or the public welfare may require; or to impair or waive any right or remedy in the premises now existing in favor of the United States.

This act shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to that amendment whatever. I now propose, unless some gentleman, as I have said, wishes to be heard further upon the bill, to ask the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. HANBACK. I should be glad to have the gentleman yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK].

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Speaker, after the very lucid presentation of this case made by the gentleman from Georgia I shall not have any desire to detain the House longer than to say that the Kansas Pacific Railroad runs through my district a distance of 150 or nearly 200 miles; that it runs through counties that have been organized counties for years, and holding lands within the limits of those counties upon which it has never paid a dollar of tax.

Notwithstanding those quite discouraging incidents, which are common with all new counties, these counties have grown up into populations ranging from twelve to fifteen and eighteen thousand people. The lands are public lands of the United States outside of the railroad limits, every alternate section being a part of the public domain; and consequently for years the settlers had to struggle along to build their court-houses and school-houses and meet other necessary expenditures of the counties out of the personal-property tax. Now, it would seem to be only fair that this company—that the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Central Pacific Railway Company—by some wise manner of legislation should be directed in such a way that proper and legitimate taxation may be collected from these lands, and in addition also that the fees due for the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying these lands should be paid into the United States Treasury. There is no trouble about this matter to my mind. The Committee on the Pacific Railroads have stated correctly—the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Georgia was the chairman—have stated the condition of affairs correctly after a careful and thorough study of the question. This bill is the best product of their thought.

When a man goes into one of these counties under the provisions of this bill, if it shall become a law, he goes to the county treasurer's office and pays the tax assessed against the subdivision of this land. There will be found under the operation of the law also a statement in the county treasurer's office showing the amount of costs due for surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands. It is his duty under the law, before he is entitled to exercise the right of taking possession of the land, to go to the nearest land office and pay to the receiver of public moneys the amount that is due for the cost of surveying, selecting, &c.

Then, provided the railway company does not avail itself of the right it would have to redeem this land under the tax sale when the period of three years shall have passed by, the purchaser at the tax sale would be entitled to a deed from the county treasurer or be entitled to a patent from the United States on payment of the fees due for the selecting. This applies solely to organized counties. Some gentleman on the floor has suggested that five or six men might get together to organize a county. Such a thing is impossible, so far as I know; at least it is in Kansas, because there the law requires there shall be at least 1,500 bona fide citizens, which fact shall be ascertained by a census regularly taken, before a county can be organized.

As fast as a county is organized it comes under the provisions of this bill. I submit to the House it is a fair proposition, fair to the States and fair to the roads, and that this bill should pass.

Mr. CRISP. I now call for the previous question on the bill and the amendment.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I should like to have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has called for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment proposed by Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CRISP. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRACT PRISON LABOR.

Mr. JAMES. I call up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 1622) to prohibit any officer, agent, or servant of the Government of the United States of America to hire or contract out the labor of prisoners incarcerated for violating the laws of the Government of the United States of America.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for any officer, agent, or servant of the Government of the United States to contract with any person or corporation, or permit any warden, agent, or official of any State prison, penitentiary, jail, or house of correction where criminals of the United States may be incarcerated to hire or contract out the labor of said criminals, or any part of them, who may hereafter be confined in any prison, jail, or other place of incarceration for violation of any laws of the Government of the United States of America.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall offend against the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, at the discretion of the court, or shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 for each offense.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very simple one and very plain upon its face. It provides that after its enactment no convicts, no criminals sentenced by the courts of the United States, shall be incarcerated in penal institutions where the contract system exists. There were on the 1st of July, 1885, in the several penal institutions to which the criminals of the United States Government are sent 975 convicts. A considerable proportion of them are sent to those institutions where the contract system obtains. The larger proportion of them are sent to penal institutions where other systems exist.

It is perhaps not known to the members of the House generally that the United States Government owns no penitentiaries or institutions of that kind except that at Fort Smith, Ark., as we heard from the gentleman from Arkansas last week, the Government owns a jail or penitentiary, and that in several Territories there are penitentiaries. But outside of these the United States Government itself does not own or control any of these institutions.

It has been strongly urged that the United States Government itself should organize and control an institution of this kind, where its criminals could be sent, to be managed on the most approved system in the interest of the Government and for the reformation of the criminal. This was urged by Mr. Brewster, when Attorney-General of the United States. The present Attorney-General has, likewise, strongly urged it. The association of prison reformers have strongly urged it. A United States jury in the State of New York, for the southern district, in 1879 urged it in a series of resolutions on the attention of the Government. To such an institution the criminals of the United States Government would be sent, and would be employed; but would not be employed in such a way as that their labor should conflict with honest labor outside of the prison walls.

This bill is in the interest of the honest laborer and of the honest mechanic. The present system, which prevails in certain of the penal institutions of the country, has worked great damage to the honest workman outside of the prison walls. In my own district one industry, a very large one—that of manufacturing hats—has been almost entirely crushed out, and the honest workman is thrown out of employment because the manufacturer can not compete with the labor of the convicts employed by the contractors at the reduced price which they get it.

I do not think it is necessary for me to explain further the objects of this bill. I am ready to answer any questions, if any gentleman desires. If no gentleman desires to ask any question, I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

I beg leave to append the report on contract convict labor which I had the honor to submit in 1884 from the Committee on Labor in this House. It is as follows:

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Labor, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 995:

The Committee on Labor, to whom was referred House bill 995, respectfully reports that the object sought to be accomplished by said bill is the abolition of what is known as the contract convict-labor system, so far as the prisoners of the United States are concerned.

The United States Government does not own or maintain jails and penitentiaries for its criminals, except as noted below, but its prisoners are sent to the jails, penitentiaries, State prisons, or houses of correction belonging to the several States, under different arrangements as to cost of maintenance to the Government.

The exceptions spoken of are as follows: The Government owns a penitentiary in each of the following Territories: Idaho, Montana, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, and a jail in Western Arkansas and in the District of Columbia. The number of prisoners of the United States confined in the penal institutions of the several States, according to the Department of Justice, is about as follows:

Alabama	...	Missouri	16
Arkansas	...	Nebraska	2
California	25	Nevada	...
Colorado	...	New Hampshire	19
Connecticut	11	New Jersey	13
Delaware	...	New York	319
Florida	...	North Carolina	...
Georgia	...	Ohio	10
Illinois	138	Oregon	11
Indiana	45	Pennsylvania	50
Iowa	15	Rhode Island	3
Kansas	10	South Carolina	...

The system of contracting out the labor of the criminals obtains in most of these States. The State of California, under a provision of its new constitution, prohibits the employment of convict labor under the contract system, and requires the employment of such labor, after January 1, 1882, on behalf of the State. The State of Michigan also has the State contract system. The State of Maine and the penitentiary in Eastern Pennsylvania have non-contract systems. In the penal institutions of these non-contract States there are about three hundred of the criminals of the United States Government.

In the State of New York, at the last annual election, the question of the abolition of the contract system was submitted to the popular vote. The result was as follows: A total of 673,534 votes were cast, with a majority for the abolition of the system of 138,856. This was the largest vote ever cast in the State of New York upon any proposition submitted to the people by nearly 50,000. During the present session of the Legislature of that State the following law has been enacted:

"The superintendent of State prisons, or any other authority of this State, shall not renew or extend any existing or pending contract or make any new contract for the employment of any convicts in any of the prisons, penitentiaries, or reformatories of this State."

In the penal institutions of the State of New York, as has been stated, are over three hundred of the criminals of the United States Government. Add this number to those now in the prisons of non-contract States, and we have over six hundred, or three-fifths of the United States' prisoners, now serving sentences in the various penal institutions of the country.

At a convention of the National Prison Reform Association, held in New York on February 26, 27, and 28, this year, various schemes of reform were advocated, and the contract system was generally denounced.

Mr. Eugene R. Smith, of the New York Prison Association, said that it would be cheaper for the State of New York to board all of its prisoners at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, if it could insure their reformation, than to maintain the present system.

The advocates of the contract system were unable to refute the statements of those who maintained that under the contract system the reformatory character of the prisons has wholly disappeared, and that by it the tendency is that the convicts are confirmed in their evil ways.

Hon. Charles F. Peck, commissioner of the bureau of labor statistics of the State of New York, in his report of January 10, 1884, says:

"Notwithstanding the fact that this order was made by the Attorney-General of the United States"—

The order sending to the several penal institutions of the State its convicts—"under a law of Congress, I was unable to reconcile the idea that there was not some more potent reason behind all, and pursued the line of inquiry till I discovered the disgraceful fact that both the officials of our State prisons and the county penitentiaries had openly bid for the privilege of maintaining United States convicts, free of all expense to the National Government."

And further:

"As the result of the contract between the Erie County penitentiary officials and the Department of Justice at Washington, the State of New York is to-day supporting United States criminals free of all expense to the National Government, and in their inhuman greed to make their penitentiary pay in dollars and cents two convicts are crowded into one cell, and the rights of honest free laborers outraged."

The evils of the contract system are many, but your committee deem it necessary to only mention the following:

(1) The contract system is wholly adverse to reform, and therefore should be abrogated. The prisoners are treated as if they were so many dumb beasts, being driven to their daily tasks by men whose aim is to get a certain amount of work out of them each day.

Dr. Wines says:

"It places for the entire working day all the prisoners contracted for, to a great extent, under the control of men with no official responsibility; men who see in the convict only so much machinery for making money; men whose only, or at any rate, whose chief recommendation to the position they hold in the prison is that they are the highest bidders for the human beings hired by them. It introduces into the prisons agents of the contractors, who, for the most part, have not only no interest in aiding reform of the convicts, but are too ready to oppose it, by offering mischievous indulgences to the convicts as an inducement to further industrial efforts."

Dr. Wines says further, to show that no reform is possible under this system:

"In former times, especially conspicuous in New York, was the fact of the establishment in the prisons of a power behind the throne greater than the throne; a power well-nigh omnipotent within its sphere; a power that coerces, bribes, and threatens in pursuit of its selfish ends; a power that makes and unmakes officers, imposes and remits punishment through agents whom it has been able to bend to its will, and even stoops to mean devices to get the poor prisoner who has incurred its wrath into straits and difficulties, that its revenge may be gratified by the sight of his punishment."

(2) The contract system works great injury to honest labor in many branches of industry. Investigations by committees of State Legislatures has shown this fact repeatedly. The special committee of the Sixty-third General Assembly of Ohio on prison labor, in their report, says:

"The testimony shows conclusively that the contract system carried on in our penal institutions is directly responsible for a large percentage of the reductions which have taken place in the wages of thousands of mechanics during the past four years. Nearly every manufacturer who testified before your committee attributed a large percentage of the reduction in wages to the system which enabled manufacturers who have prison contracts, and who employ large forces of convicts at cheap rates, to go into the market and undersell them. There is little or no room for doubt as to the evil effect of this system upon the interests of free labor. It not only tends to pauperize honest labor, but it is, in a great measure, responsible for the overcrowded condition of many of our penal institutions."

The result of the investigations by the commissioner of the bureau of labor statistics of the State of New York is:

"The contract system of prison labor is directly responsible, to a great extent, for the reduction of wages and loss of employment suffered by mechanics engaged in the same branches of industry which are carried on under the contract system in the prisons."

In the testimony recently published by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, taken by said committee last summer, are the statements of men representing various trades and trade organizations, which are unanimously in favor of the abolition of the contract system.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 995), with amendments, as follows;

Insert in section 1, line 5, after the word "corporation," the following words: "Or permit any warden, agent, or official of any State prison, penitentiary, jail, or house of correction where criminals of the United States may be incarcerated." In line 6 strike out the word "prisoner" and insert the words "said criminals;" and in the same line, after the word "who," strike out the words "are now or."

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 51, noes 9.

Mr. BENNETT. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. ANDERSON of Kansas and Mr. BURROWS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 36 members voting therefor.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask that the bill be again read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object. It has been read twice already.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 252, nays 8, not voting 64; as follows:

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent the recapitulation of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have my name recorded on this vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. COMPTON. I was not; but it was not my fault.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not permit the gentleman's vote to be recorded now unless he was in the Hall when his name was called.

Mr. COMPTON. I was not present, but if I had been I would have voted "ay."

The following members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. GROSVENOR.
Mr. CANDLER with Mr. LAIRD.
Mr. ARNOT with Mr. STRUBLE.

The following were announced as paired for this day

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I was not in my seat at the time the balloting began on this bill, and I therefore am not entitled to vote. I had gone to the Senate Chamber to consult with Senator JACKSON on some official business and remained a few moments to hear the opening remarks of Senator EDMUNDS on his resolution. Had I been in my seat I would have voted "ay" on this bill.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, I was out of the House when my name was called, but I would like to vote on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Chair can not entertain a request of that sort at this time.

Mr. HIESTAND. I would have voted for the bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. JAMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD-GRANT LANDS.

Mr. VAN EATON asked leave to present and have printed the views of the minority of the Committee on the Public Lands on the bills (H. R. 6658 and H. R. 6659) declaring forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of the railroads named in said bills.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The first business in order is the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask the attention of the committee for a few minutes only to a hurried statement of the general outline and salient features of this bill; and I do so in the hope that such a presentation may in some measure conduce to intelligent action on the bill as well as promote its enactment into law.

I had intended, Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the committee to indulge in some general reflections touching Indian policies, but as under the new rules of the House existing laws can not be changed on general appropriation bills, which are now held to their legitimate office of carrying out existing laws, I have on further consideration concluded to offer no observations on those subjects.

According to the analysis of the Indian bill as made by the Indian Office the various appropriations are grouped into seven classes or under seven heads. First, those appropriations which relate to the current and contingent expenses of the Indian service; second, those appropriations which relate to the fulfilling of treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes; third, what is called miscellaneous support; fourth, incidental expenses of the Indian service; fifth, miscellaneous appropriations; sixth, appropriations for the purposes of education; and seventh, interest on trust funds. An inspection of this bill will show that in reference to the first class of appropriations it very nearly corresponds with the bill of the last Congress. The amount carried in this bill for current and contingent expenses, constituting the first class of appropriations, is $209,300. The whole amount of appropriations for kindred purposes under the last bill was $219,800, there being in this bill a reduction of $10,500. I will not consume the time of the committee in pointing out the various items which have led to this general result, because were I to undertake to do that I should be carried far beyond the limit of the hour allotted to me.

With reference to the second class of appropriations, those for fulfilling treaty stipulations, the amount carried by this bill is $2,453,697.84, as against an aggregate of $2,583,833 in the last bill, there being a reduction in this class of appropriations of $130,225.

With reference to the third class of appropriations, miscellaneous support, the amount is $1,061,300.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman leaves this class of appropriations I would like to ask him a question. I notice the amount recommended by this bill is in round numbers $100,000 less than the amount appropriated for the current year.

Mr. WELLBORN. One hundred and sixty-three thousand five hundred and eighty-three dollars.

Mr. CANNON The gentleman will allow me to ask whether this reduction is due to the fact that the necessity for making these appropriations has ceased.

Mr. WELLBORN. Very largely. If the gentleman desires it I will give the principal items which have caused the reduction. For instance, $14,100 has heretofore been appropriated under treaty stipulations for the Chippewas at Boisé Fort, in Wisconsin. Those Indians are mostly in Minnesota, but the reservation is in Wisconsin. Then there is another treaty which has expired with the Klamaths and Modocs. This will give about $20,000 of the amount. Then there was appropriated last year $52,125, a balance due the Choctaws under a former appropriation of $300,000 when they admitted the freedman to citizenship in the Choctaw tribe. Then there is dropped out of this bill an item of $41,000, the balance of an appropriation due the Creeks for a large cession of their lands. Those are the principal items, though there are some others. I will state, however, as a matter of justice in reference to the last bill that the greatest part of this reduction has resulted from the expiration of treaties and also from the omission of items which had finished up treaties with the Indian tribes and could no longer be properly appropriated for.

With reference to the next item, general and miscellaneous expenses, the amount carried by this bill is $132,000, against $134,300 in the last bill, being a reduction of $2,300.

Under the next item, miscellaneous appropriations, the amount embraced in this bill is $452,000, as against $434,400 in the last bill. The amount appropriated by the present bill for the support of schools is $1,099,415; the amount carried by the last bill was $1,085,065, being an increase in the present bill over the last bill of $14,300. The appropriation for interest on trust funds is exactly the same in this bill as in the bill of last year, with the exception of $230 which the Indian Office found was no longer needed to be appropriated for.

The general aggregate of the appropriations for the Indian service this year is $5,502,562.84 as against $5,777,451.21, the whole decrease being $274,888.37. The estimates are $548,697 in excess of the bill.

One further remark, Mr. Chairman, and then I shall leave the bill for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. In the preparation of this bill, the Committee on Appropriations has endeavored to adhere with absolute strictness to the new rule of the House which declares out of order on general appropriation bills any provision changing existing law. This bill is confined to the legitimate office which the rules of the House give to it; and hence there can be found in it no new legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is all I desire to say, and I will yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], a member of the committee.

How much of my time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. WELLBORN. Perhaps the gentleman from Minnesota had better take the floor in his own right, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present a few general considerations in connection with the programme and method of dealing with the Indians both in the past and as to the future. With the light and experience of to-day, it seems clear that the fundamental error of the past in dealing with the Indians and in meeting the Indian problem was in treating with and regarding the various savage and nomadic tribes within our borders as quasi-independent nations. This, in view of the status of both the whites and the Indians, was putting both in a false position. It was untrue and unjust to the Indians in their then condition to assume that they had attained the dignity of independent nations.

This erroneous assumption logically led to our system of cumbrous and intricate so-called Indian treaties—a system under which more injustice has been done the Indian than we can fully measure or are willing to admit. Whenever a portion of the lands roamed over and partially occupied by some savage band of Indians was wanted the executive department would send some shrewd and insinuating agent to negotiate a treaty with the band.

The provisions of the so-called treaty were in the main the suggestions and notions of the agent. The Indians neither comprehended the value of their possessions nor realized what would be a suitable or beneficial recompense and equivalent. Like children carried away with sweetmeats and candies, so were these children of the forest induced oftentimes by beads or other mere baubles to affix their marks to treaties the mere product of a one-sided negotiation, the provisions of which have scarcely been explained, or if explained were hardly understood. And then when the preliminary farce was complete the treaty embellished with some crosses sandwiched in among some pompous, unpronounceable, and oftentimes invented names, was laid before the American Senate, and by it ratified in secret session with all the formality, pomp, and dignity of a treaty with the courts of St. James or St. Petersburg; and then, the ceremony being complete, our concern for the Indians—other than merely fulfilling the provisions of the treaty—wholly ceased. Wilkins Micawber, being about to part with his friend Thomas Traddles, exclaimed:

> My dear Mr. Traddles, I couldn't think of leaving this place without acquitting myself of my obligation to you. I have the pleasure of handing you my I O U; and now, thank God, having liquidated my obligation, I can again breathe the air of an honest man.

So our Government having gone through the pomp and ceremony of a treaty—aside from the mere purpose of fulfilling its obligations—did by its attitude and acts declare that it had thus and thereby fully acquitted itself of all its obligation to the Indian. Such treaties, though literally liquidated, were practically of as little real value to the Indian as Micawber's note was to Thomas Traddles.

The fiction of an independent nation and the paraphernalia of a treaty were not only held to be a decent excuse and apology for a vast and ever-growing land-grabbing policy, but was also the occasion and ground on which the Indian was practically utterly abandoned to himself. The treaty being complete, our people entered into possession of the ceded territory, and the Indians withdrew and receded into the unexplored and unknown wilderness and were there left to continue in their savage mode of life, rendered still more savage and dangerous by the powder and spirits furnished them by mercenary whites.

Nothing was done for the civilization and education of the Indians, but whatever was done had a demoralizing and dangerous tendency. Inducing the Indians to believe they were great, independent nations, giving them liberal and oftentimes extravagant annuities for lands which they themselves hardly felt or realized they owned without teaching them how to make proper use of their annuities, all this tended but to make the Indians more arrogant, greedy, and dangerous neighbors. And whatever more was essential to effect complete demoralization was furnished by association with the lawless elements of our own race. All the education we thus in one way or another gave the Indian tended but to build up and emphasize the savage element in him, and as a consequence we had frequent and sometimes very bloody and serious Indian wars.

Between the wars and the treaties we gradually but steadily encroached upon and pressed the Indian back farther and farther into the wilderness, and there is no telling how long the process would have continued had not the supply of wilderness given out. And as long as we could press the Indian back and keep him out of reach and sight we were content to let him remain in his savage state and paid no attention to his education and civilization. During all this period of Indian maladministration there was a curious variety of public sentiment in regard to the Indian. Those who lived on the verge of civilization and came in daily contact, more or less, with the Indian were prone to regard and treat him as little better than the savage beast of the forest. To the frontiersman there was no Indian so good as the dead Indian.

In the older States, and among those who chiefly knew the Indian through the novels of Cooper and others, there was a tendency to ascribe the noblest virtues and the grandest of human sympathies and aspirations to him, and that these, though always inherent, were not always active and visible, owing solely to the contaminating influence of rapacious white men. The badness of the Indian was wholly an absorbed badness—absorbed from depraved whites. Between these two extreme views the logic of events drove us to a surer, juster, and more rational basis. When the Indian had reached the last patch of wilderness and we were brought face to face with him on all sides, then it dawned upon the sober and better judgment of the country that, while the Indian was by nature and habit a savage, yet that he was, to a very large extent, amenable to processes of civilization, and that it was within our power and clear duty to make him an industrious, useful, law-abiding, and self-supporting citizen. It took some time for public sentiment to crystallize and become active. Old programmes and old prejudices had to be laid aside and overcome; the nation had to undergo a change of faith and heart.

No great cause of human progress ever lacked its apostle and missionary. The cause of Indian education found its Pratt, its Armstrong, and its Cox, who not only demonstrated that the Indian had almost as great capacities for cultivation and improvement as his white brother, and that he could be transformed into as good, useful, and industrious a citizen, but also awakened and aroused the public sentiment to such an extent that the political body, the state, intervened and assumed the duty it had so long neglected. The American people, the state, no less than the Indian, have great cause to thank those noble men and women, the pioneers in a practical useful secular Indian education. In this land of liberty great reforms ever grow from the people up to the state, for such seems to be the essence and spirit of our institutions, and when the state is once thus impressed the problem is a verity. The duty of educating our Indians is no longer an open question, and yet it is not till recently this can be truly said. But since the nation has become fully alive to the subject we have made and are making rapid strides, while our Indian appropriation bills have increased from $4,567,017.63 in 1876, to $5,525,873.64, in this bill, as the following detailed table will show:

Statement of amounts appropriated in the general appropriation acts making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal years 1877 to 1886, inclusive, and in the present bill.

1878	4,769,079 70	1884	5,379,655 91
1879	4,733,875 72	1885	5,903,151 26
1880	4,681,840 85	1886	5,777,451 21
1881	4,657,262 72	1887 (proposed bill)	5,525,873 64
1882	4,587,866 88

Yet the increase has been mainly in the educational items of the bill, in respect to which there has been broad and generous liberality. The appropriation in the present bill for general educational purposes, aside from treaty items, is $1,099,415.

The foundation for the present extensive general appropriation for industrial schools and other educational purposes was first laid in 1876, the sum of $20,000 being appropriated in the bill of that year. Subsequent appropriations for this purpose have been and are as follows:

1877	$30,000 00	1882	*432,200 00
1878	60,000 00	1883	680,200 00
1879	75,000 00	1884	992,800 00
1880	75,000 00	1885	1,107,665 00
1881	85,000 00	1886 (present bill)	1,099,415 00

*Including Hampton, Carlisle, and Forest Grove, and other general purposes.

The foregoing figures show that the general educational item in 1881 was but $85,000, while the next year it was increased to $432,200, and in the same year the office of Indian school superintendent was established. The increased appropriation and the establishment of this office in 1882 mark the epoch at which our Indian school system was fairly placed on a firm and progressive footing. Since that time, though much remains yet to be done, rapid progress has been made, and the mere tentative stage has been passed, as a glance at the present status of our Indian schools will plainly show.

Our estimated Indian school population is about 36,000 in round numbers. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the total average attendance at all our Indian schools was 9,314, or a little over 25 per cent. of the school population, distributed among 261 different schools, of which 200 are supported in whole or in part by the Government, 28 by the State of New York, and 33 by religious societies. A record exists of the average attendance at the purely Government day and boarding schools since 1881. From this it appears that in 1882 there were 125 such schools, with an average attendance of 3,764 pupils; in 1883 139 schools, with 5,071 attendance; in 1884 156 schools, with 5,162 attendance, and in 1885 170 schools, with 6,008 attendance, showing a marked and promising increase in the number of Government schools and the total average of attendance, and showing that the schools are in a healthy and progressive state.

The following table shows in detail the variety, number, average attendance, and total cost of our Indian schools, aside from those conducted by the State of New York and religious societies, namely:

Boarding, day, training, and other schools—number, average attendance, and cost.

Kind of schools.	Number.	Average attendance.	Total cost.
Boarding schools under agency supervision	84	4,066.27	$488,974 50
Day schools under agency supervision	86	1,941.90	44,594 15
Training schools	5	1,143.00	234,854 65

Hampton and Lincoln are also training schools, but not wholly under Government supervision, and hence named separately.

The names, location, and statistics of the seven Indian training schools referred to above are given in the following table:

School.	Location.	Employés.	Capacity.	Months in session.	Average attendance.	Cost.
Carlisle training school	Carlisle, Pa	38	400	12	475	$79,852 00

The following is a detailed statement of the schools, twenty-three in number:

Number of schools and rate of tuition per contract.	Average number of pupils.	Cost.
6 at $100 per annum	227	$17,166 45
1 at $110 per annum	13	857 23
2 at $120 per annum	112	12,478 66
1 at $130 per annum	50	2,244 31
13 at $167 per annum	308	47,906 68
23	710	80,653 33

In respect to the comparative cost of the different kinds of schools the school superintendent makes the following reflections:

It appears that the cost per capita per month of maintaining and educating a pupil at a Government school is considerably greater than the cost of maintaining and educating a pupil at a contract school. In explanation of this fact it is suggested that the Government does not pay to a contract school the entire cost of a pupil's maintenance and education. The machinery of contract schools is not supplied for the exclusive purpose of maintaining and educating Indian children. The machinery of such schools is usually supplied for other educational or for benevolent purposes. The education of Indian children, under contract with the Government, is generally undertaken either for the purpose of filling a school to its capacity or for benevolent reasons. The Government does not, therefore, pay to these "contract schools" the entire cost of maintaining and educating a pupil. It merely helps the school by contributing a part of the cost of supporting and instructing the Indian children who are placed under contract at such a school.

SUPPLIES PRODUCED AND USED BY SCHOOLS.

At a number of the boarding schools, and at one day school, vegetables and grains were raised on the school farms and fuel was provided by the pupils, all of which supplies were used by the schools producing them. Only twenty-seven out of eighty-four boarding schools and one day school reported the value of supplies of this kind produced and used by said schools last year. (The total value of these supplies was $11,080.01.) Of this amount the Yakima boarding school, Washington Territory, produced $2,899.72; the Puyallup boarding school, $1,141.75; the S'Kokomish boarding school, $1,072.30; the Chehalis boarding school, $763.30, the three last-named schools being located within the limits of the Nisqually and S'Kokomish agency, Washington Territory. These four schools in Washington Territory produced more than half of all the supplies as above reported.

A tabulated statement of the value of the supplies thus produced and used is as follows:

Name of school.	Agency.	State or Territory.	Value of supplies.

In respect to this matter the school superintendent observes:

In an attempt to stimulate the Indian agents and school employés into an earnest effort to make the school farm and garden useful and productive, the agents and school superintendents were last spring informed by circular that each school must depend upon its own farm and garden for a large part of the subsistence required by the pupils. That this action had a good effect is proven by the fact that the above figures show an aggregate increase of 17,000 bushels of grain and vegetables over the school productions of 1884; but in this direction all has not been done that should have been done.

From the foregoing statistics it clearly appears that while much has been mapped out and accomplished, there is still a large field to cover and room for much improvement and expansion. All the schools partake more or less of an industrial character—indeed, in many of them the chief object is a practical industrial education, to make the Indian a workman rather than a scholar.

Aside from the schools in New York and schools carried on under the auspices of religious societies, our Indian schools may be classified as reservation day and boarding schools, contract schools, and training schools. Of all these classes the least intrinsic good is accomplished by the reservation day school, for the reason that whatever is done in school is undone at home. The Indian child can not, like his white brother, return from school to a civilized home. He is daily in two atmospheres—that of civilization and that of the savage. What one is daily building up the other is daily tearing down. The system involves a great loss in mental and moral force, and aside from all other objections one chief vice is, that the Indian child does not receive a fair trial. The system is not a fair test of the child's capacity, and should, wherever possible, be abandoned for something better.

By contract schools I refer to those schools in the States and Territories where Indian pupils are educated, per contract, at a certain per capita price. The plan and design of this education is mainly industrial, and excellent work is done at many, if not most, of these schools. The objections to them, if any, are that they are oftentimes, so far as the Indian is concerned, mere adjuncts of larger white schools, where the Indian department is regarded simply as secondary and subsidiary to the main school, and where the industrial character of the education is apt to be more or less lost sight of and overlooked in the zeal for the more purely intellectual training that is naturally connected with a school instituted in the first instance and mainly carried on for the benefit of white pupils. But in this connection let us not overlook the great advantage the Indian child necessarily derives from association more or less close with white pupils—the living human model ever before his eye.

The reservation boarding school, especially where connected with a farm, is no doubt, in the main, the best method for reaching and civilizing the Indians, old as well as young. Such a school not only performs all the functions of an industrial training school for the children, but is also a civilizing force continually operating upon the adult Indians. The children must necessarily feel more happy and buoyant in being near their homes and their parents, while the parents are spared the pain and anguish of having their children removed to distant points, out of sight and reach. Besides, the parents, relatives, and friends of the children can daily witness and observe the pursuits in which the children are engaged, the progress made, and the happy results. And all this will inevitably evoke parental pride and a yearning for something purer and better. The old Indian will delight in the progress of his child, and while he realizes that he can never fully attain the child's level, yet he will strive to be as much like his child as his beclouded nature will permit; and he will learn to cherish and respect an institution which visibly and in his presence accomplishes so much good. The reservation boarding school not only educates its pupils, but educates more or less the entire reservation population. It is something more than a mere school; it is a silent but effective missionary, civilizing and reforming all, old as well as young, within the radius of its beneficent influence.

The Indian training schools, such as those at Carlisle, Hampton, and Lincoln, are the pioneers as well as the models of modern industrial Indian schools. We owe a debt of gratitude to these institutions and their promoters. They were the first to demonstrate and make clear to us the great capacity of the Indian for education and civilization, and that the Indian could with proper training be made as useful, as industrious a citizen as his white brother. But, more than this, and what was at the time quite as essential, those institutions, their friends and promoters, built up and created in the nation and among our people an interest and zeal in the civilization, education, and welfare of the Indian hitherto unknown, and which was clearly one of the first requisites. These institutions not only educated the Indian, but educated our people to a fuller and more earnest realization of the duty we owed to the Indian. It was under the impulse of this education that our Indian educational appropriations grew and increased so rapidly from year to year, especially since 1881. Without the sentiment in favor of Indian education thus created by those training schools and their promoters, such large educational appropriation as that of the present bill would hardly be granted or tolerated.

These training schools, while they give the pupil the best of training and instruction, are nevertheless not performing that general and beneficent work of civilization accomplished by the reservation boarding school. The removal of the children thousands of miles away from their homes and parents must necessarily be a great source of grief to both parents and children. The children gradually, in the midst of their surroundings, overcome and get the better of such grief. Not so with the parent. To him the absence of the child is a continuing and ever present grief. The very place of the child's absence is to the Indian parent a mystery. A system that carries his child out of his sight and reach can have no charm for the Indian parent. He necessarily doubts its efficacy.

The unknown is always more or less a matter of doubt. Instead of delighting in the education of his child, the parent learns to dread and seeks to avoid it, and this feeling of the parent necessarily percolates and takes possession of the whole tribe; and thus it comes to pass that while these training schools give the pupil a fine training, that as regards the residue of the Indian population they are but spent moral and intellectual forces. For the reason that these institutions afford the highest kind of Indian industrial training, and are so few, they should be maintained in our Indian school system and perform the function of academies or normal schools.

But for the reason that these schools never can be as potent a civilizing factor among our adult Indian population as our reservation boarding schools are, there should be no increase or extension in these training schools. I am convinced that our chief efforts should be devoted to the increase and expansion of our reservation boarding-school system. This is the focal point. This is the leaven which will more or less gradually and ultimately leaven our entire Indian population and engender it with a new heart and new spirit. By keeping up the full vigor of our boarding schools on the reservation we not only educate and civilize both young and old, but we accustom them to the machinery and modus operandi of our educational system, and familiarize them with it so that they can in time become competent to operate among themselves a system of common schools similar to that of our white people; and until this stage of progress has been reached the Government must necessarily continue to provide funds, and to supervise, manage, and care for the education of our Indian wards.

But to facilitate and hasten the civilization of our Indians something besides our school system is necessary and imperative. Most of our Indian tribes occupy and wander over vast reservations, without any fixed or settled farms or homes. The very size and immensity of these reservations tend to keep up the roaming and nomadic spirit, and militate against a settled andindustrious life. Besides, it seems the height of extravagance to permit a few semi-civilized Indians to occupy a vast reservation, to clothe and feed them thereon, and to derive no real benefit from the land either for whites or Indians. The first step in the progress of our own race was that from the life of a nomad to that of a tiller of the soil; and so the first step of progress among our Indians must be to become tillers of the soil, become farmers in the fullest and broadest sense of the term. The Indian must be taught to acquire a taste for agricultural pursuits. He must be taught to acquire a taste and zeal for the ownership of land in severalty, and to realize the importance of having a piece of land that he may call his own as against all the world.

The only way in which this spirit and taste can be ingrafted upon our Indians is to break up our large Indian reservations—indeed all of them as such—and to make proper allotments of land in severalty to the Indians, and to sell and dispose of the residue at fair figures, and devote the proceeds to the education and civilization of the Indians. No Indian should be permitted to hold and occupy more land than he can till. The balance should for proper compensation be open to the tillage and settlement of the white man. And the proceeds of this surplus land should be the fund to furnish the means for the education and civilization of our Indians, rather than the extensive appropriations we are now annually making from the Treasury. In other words, our extensive Indian reservations should at once be so utilized as to furnish the Indians with suitable farms and with the funds for their improvement, and thereby the Indians would become wholly self-sustaining and cease to be a burden on the Treasury of the United States. The present bill shows that the Indians are a great financial burden to the Government, and this burden will never cease till we utilize the Indian reservations in the manner indicated.

General Sheridan in his annual report says on this subject:

The Indians are the richest people in this country, as communities. Their reservations include some of the best land, and if divided among the heads of families each family would have thousands of acres. If I may be permitted to suggest, I would recommend that each family be given and located on the 320 acres now provided for them by law in case of actual settlement. The Government should then condemn all the balance of each reservation, buy it in at $1.25 per acre, and with the proceeds purchase Government bonds, to be held in trust by the Interior Department, only giving to the Indians each year the interest on the bonds for their support. Let this money, if you please, be disbursed the same as the money appropriated each year by Congress. The practical working would be about as follows: The Crow Indians, for instance have nearly 4,800,000 acres of land. There are not more than thirty-three hundred of them, and counting five persons to a family—a large estimate—they could be settled separately on 320 acres for each family and then have over 4,500,000 acres left, which the Government could buy of them when condemned. If the proceeds were invested in Government bonds and the interest used for their support, it would be more money than is now appropriated by Congress for their yearly maintenance. It would be their own money, and take the question of annual appropriations for them out of Congress.

Take the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians as another example. They have nearly 4,300,000 acres; 200,000 would settle them in severalty, and the 4,100,000 remaining, if purchased by the Government in the manner described, would yield an annual interest sufficient for their support.

The Ute Indians have about 5,100,000 acres, which, if purchased in the same way, would furnish a revenue adequate for their support. The same plan could be extended to cover most of the Indian reservations in the country.

I only propose that the Government should buy these lands for simplicity and safety. Settlers and speculators would buy them and take them at the average of $1.25 per acre. Some of them are now worth eight or ten dollars per acre. In this way the Indians would have perpetual security in the principal until Congress chooses to give it to them to be used as they may see fit. The Government would lose nothing, and the Indians would only be getting the value of their property safely invested. The Indians are not poor; they are only incompetent at the present time to take care of their own property, and therefore require looking after. The treaties we have made with them might interfere with the condemnation and purchase of these lands by the Government, but Congress could easily devise some means of overcoming this difficulty.

In a supplement to his annual report General Sheridan further elaborates and elucidates the views above expressed, as follows:

INFORMATION IN DETAIL ON WHICH THE RECOMMENDATIONS RELATING TO INDIAN LANDS WERE MADE BY LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SHERIDAN IN HIS ANNUAL REPORT.

In my annual report for 1885 I recommended that each Indian family be given and located upon the 320 acres now provided for them by law in case of actual settlement; that the Government then condemn the remainder of each reservation and buy it for $1.25 per acre, and with the proceeds purchase Government bonds, to be held in trust by the Interior Department, giving to the Indians each year the interest on the bonds for their support. I cited in illustration of what would be the practical workings of this suggestion the case of the Crows, the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and the Utes, but the limits of my report did not permit a full elucidation of the advantages that would accrue to the Indians, nor even an allusion to the large amount of land now lying idle that would thereby be opened to settlement, and increase by so much the material prosperity of the nation.

When it is attempted to deal with this subject more in detail, a difficulty is at once encountered, in that neither the actual area of the various reservations has been accurately determined, nor the numbers of the Indians occupying them known within more than approximate limits. It will, therefore, not be possible to show the exact workings of the method proposed, but only a general summary covering the cases of the larger reservations in each Territory and the most populous of the different tribes.

Since the appropriations for the support of the Indians are not in every case made specifically for those upon any particular reservation, but rather collectively for those inhabiting some State or Territory, in making comparisons with the sum now required for the subsistence of the Indians and the annuities allowed them by treaty, the aggregate for a Territory or several Territories has necessarily been considered rather than for each tribe or reservation.

In Dakota the principal reservations are the Fort Berthold and those inhabited by the various bands of Sioux. The Fort Berthold reservation, with an area of over 2,900,000 acres, has a population of 1,300 people; the others—the Crow Creek, Old Winnebago, and Sioux—an area of nearly 22,250,000 acres and a population of about 25,800. Carrying out the proposals of my report would, in the former case, afford an annual income of over $140,000, and in the latter case a surplus unoccupied by the Indians of over 20,500,000 acres (over 32,000 square miles), or an extent of territory equal to the combined area of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, the proceeds of which, at 4 per cent. per annum, would yield an interest of over $1,000,000. With two of the smaller reservations—the Devil's Lake and South Mountain—area 276,480 acres, population over 1,800—nearly half the land would be required by the Indians; in this case then the income from the surplus would be small, being a little less than $8,000 per annum.

In Montana the Blackfeet reservation contains over 21,500,000 acres and a population of less than 7,000 Indians; the surplus land, equal to the area of the State of Maine, would then return an income of $1,060,000; the Crow reservation mentioned in my report could, in a similar manner, be made to produce an annual sum of $223,000.

Considering all the Indians and reservations in the Territories of Dakota and Montana, we have an aggregate area of over 54,500,000 acres, and a population of less than 45,000. The surplus area of nearly 81,000 square miles (almost equal to the entire State of Kansas) would produce an annual interest of over $2,500,000. The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, for fulfilling treaties with these tribes and for their subsistence and civilization and the pay of the employés incident to such undertaking amount to about $100,000 less than this sum.

In Wyoming the Shoshones are located upon the Wind River reservation. One hundred and seventeen thousand dollars per year could be derived from their surplus land.

In Idaho the Fort Hull reservation, occupied by the Bannocks and Shoshones, would in the same way produce each year $55,000; the Cœur d'Alene reservation $28,000. In the two Territories of Wyoming and Idaho the total area of all the reservations is nearly 5,000,000 acres; the total population nearly 6,000. An area of nearly 7,200 square miles, almost equal to the State of New Jersey, would not be required for the Indians, and an income would be yielded of about $235,000—a sum more than $100,000 in excess of the appropriation for the current year.

In Oregon the most populous reservation is the Klamath, with over 1,000,000 acres, but less than 1,000 inhabitants. It would yield nearly $50,000 a year.

In Washington Territory the Yakamas, about 3,200 in number, occupy the reservation of 800,000 acres of the same name. Here the surplus land would bear but $30,000 a year. In Oregon and in this Territory the reservations, with a total population of about 16,000, embrace 8,400,000 acres, or about seven and one-third million acres more than would be required by them under the plan proposed, which would produce per annum $370,000, or about $300,000 more than is appropriated for these Indians.

The different bands of Utes in Utah and Colorado number about 3,650, and their reservations include over 5,000,000 acres, of which the surplus portion would produce a yearly income of $240,000, or about $175,000 more than is being disbursed this year for their benefit.

In New Mexico the Navajoes, on the reservation of the same name, have now over 8,000,000 acres for a population of 23,000 people. Here the surplus land would yield over $330,000 a year.

For the surplus lands of the Mescalero Apache reservation the income would be nearly $20,000.

In Arizona the principal reservation is the White Mountain, with the agency at San Carlos. It embraces more than two and one-half million acres. Considerable uncertainty exists as to its population, but it is probably about 3,000 in the vicinity of the agency, and 2,000 more—making 5,000 in all who are now engaged in farming and in efforts to make themselves self-supporting. The latter would, however, be entitled to all the benefits obtained by the agency Indians in any scheme looking to the promotion of their general prosperity. Carrying out the proposals of my report would leave a balance of considerably over 2,000,000 acres, with, according to the plan advocated, about $110,000 per year.

Considering collectively the Indians of New Mexico and Arizona, we have reservations embracing sixteen and one-half million acres, inhabited by nearly 53,000 people. The surplus land would include about thirteen and three-fourths millions of acres, about equal to half the State of Kentucky, which would yield, according to the plan proposed, nearly $640,000, a sum greater by $350,000 than that appropriated for the current year for the support of these Indians.

In the Indian Territory the Cheyenne and Arapaho, the Kiowa and Comanche, and the Wichita reservations embrace over 8,000,000 acres. The population is about 7,750. The income from the surplus land ($375,000) would come within $75,000 of equaling the amount appropriated. Considering all the Indians in this Territory, we have a total of nearly 80,000, an extent of reservation of thirty-one and one-half millions of acres, excluding the Oklahoma country, which would produce an annual income of about one and one-third million dollars.

The Indian reservations of the United States contain about 200,000 square miles, and their population is about 260,000. Twenty-six thousand square miles would locate each family upon a half-section of land, leaving a surplus of about 170,000 square miles, which, according to the plan I have proposed, would produce annually $4,480,000. This amount exceeds by about $660,000 the entire sum appropriated for the payment of their annuities and for their subsistence and civilization.

The policy advocated in my report would be most advantageously applied gradually, the general government of the Indians being continued according to the methods now in vogue, or such improvement of them as time and experience may suggest. The ultimate development of the suggested policy would, as the Indians advance in civilization and intelligence, result in the return to them of the principal derived from the sale of their lands, which, until such measures were authorized by act of Congress, would be held as a trust for their benefit, and the income applied to their support.

Just think of it. Two hundred and sixty thousand Indians occupy and hold to the exclusion of everybody else 200,000 square miles or 128,000,000 acres of lands. Were every Indian young and old to have allotted to him 100 acres of land, which would average about 400 acres to each family, there would still be a surplus of over 100,000,000 acres. These surplus lands should be sold and converted into cash at the earliest practicable moment. No more land should be left with the Indians than they can subdue and put under cultivation, and whatever land is given to and left with them should be allotted to them in severalty at the earliest moment.

Our expensive and extensive educational system will fail to accomplish the full measure of good, will fail to effect radical and permanent reform, unless in connection therewith we break up all tribal relations, and break up and distribute by allotments and sale our extensive Indian reservations. Tribal life, tribal thoughts, tribal notions and aspirations should be forever emasculated and rooted out. Till this is done no solid basis has been laid—the old weeds and rubbish must be thoroughly removed before the new seed can take full root and grow. Such a land system as the Indian reservation system would be demoralizing and degrading to even our own race, and would lead to mental, moral, and social degradation; and what would thus necessarily and inevitably affect our own race can not but be a millstone round the neck of the Indian.

The Indian should be taught first of all how to own land in severalty, how to improve, cultivate, and raise crops on such land, and how to depend on this land for his maintenance and support instead of looking to the Government. This accomplished the most important step in the civilization of the Indian has been taken. The rest is mere routine work, requiring time, it is true, but nevertheless a task comparatively easy to be accomplished. Whenever the Indian becomes a self-supporting farmer and land-owner then he will cease to be an Indian and begin to be an American citizen, and then "he will have a love for this land as if it were his daughter, his pipes in peace, his tomahawks in war."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, I propose to occupy the time of the committee for the purpose of calling attention to what I conceive to be one of the greatest evils in the administration of our Government. I believe our whole Indian policy as it has been pursued for a great many years is wrong; that there is a vast expenditure of money not warranted by any treaty stipulation, or which will result in any benefit to the Government or to the Indians. And I would ask the patient attention of the committee while I review somewhat in detail the condition of the Indian affairs of the Government, and as minutely as time will permit the prominent features of the bill under consideration.

In common with many others I had hoped with a change in the administration of the Government there would be a change in respect to the management of the Indian affairs of the country. But it seems, in the absence of recommendations of the executive officers of the Government and from the features of this appropriation bill, we are to continue in the same old grooves, with no marked or distinctive change in the policy heretofore pursued or in a reduction of expenditures.

On the contrary, there is a decided increase in a direction not made obligatory by any treaty stipulation and justified by no good results. I allude to the increased provisions of the bill for educational purposes.

The two great political parties of the country have pledged their exertions in favor of economical government, and especially have the Democracy pledged themselves not only to reduce expenditures but also to lower taxation.

I ask, sir, how these pledges are to be redeemed unless we begin here, in this body, where the taxes are levied upon the people and where the expenditures for the support of the Government are authorized.

Mr. Chairman, in the observations which I submit on this measure I do not wish to be understood as reflecting on the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have the utmost confidence in the ability and integrity of both these gentlemen. I feel fully assured that their exertions will be directed to an honest effort to execute the laws in respect to these matters in the most faithful manner, and at the same time using all the means at their disposal to promote the welfare of the Indians. Nor is it my intention to reflect upon the Committee on Indian Affairs that formulated this bill.

It is the methods and the policy of our Indian management that have gradually grown upon the country until they have become an intolerable burden to which I object, and the viciousness of which I will undertake to point out.

I propose to examine the bill somewhat in detail and see if it is not apparent upon its face that a great saving can be had without impairing the efficiency of the service. I believe a saving of large sums can be secured, and at the same time the efficiency and energy of the service be greatly promoted.

In the first section of the bill before us, on the first and subsequent pages to the seventh, you will find there are sixty regular agents and five special agents, five inspectors, one school superintendent, and a commission of ten citizens appropriated for at a cost to the Government of $120,300.

This can be dispensed with and no injury result to the service. In the first place, there are some agencies not at all needed and others that should be consolidated. The Union agency of the five civilized nations, with the consent of the Indians, should be abolished, and I presume a few others can be as readily disposed of.

These five civilized nations have their own governors, Legislatures, and courts, and are as competent to take care of their affairs as the people of our organized Territories. The Government should transact its business directly with the authorities of these people.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact that in our regular Army we have about one commissioned officer for every eight private soldiers. In many instances and for long periods these officers and privates have but little to do except routine duty at garrisons and outposts. Besides these officers on active duty there are several hundred retired officers drawing three-fourths of the pay they would receive if in active service. Many of them are physically able and doubtless would be glad to be employed in this service with full pay. Many of these officers, from thorough discipline and long experience in Indian matters, would make the best agents and employés that could be selected in the entire country.

Mr. Chairman, no greater folly was ever committed than that of appointing Indian agents from a class of people wholly unacquainted with Indian habits and wants, and whose pursuits in life have afforded them no knowledge of Indian character. On the other hand, there is no class of our people better qualified for these positions by education, experience, and long contact with frontier life and Indian habits than the officers of the Army. These officers are specially trained in a system of accounts that should be adopted at the agencies. They are subject to a military scrutiny and trials by courts-martial for maladministration, neglect of duty, and irregularities that does not obtain among the civilian employés of the Government. We all know as a rule, now and heretofore, that the agents have been selected because of their religious sentiments or on account of the importunities of members of Congress who desire such appointments for their political friends.

Under the system long pursued the military arm of the Government has not been allowed to interfere in Indian matters at the agencies unless called upon by the agents or civil authorities. It is a part of the history of the country that white women have been carried captives to agencies under the eye of the military forces of the country, and been subjected to every indignity and outrage that savage lust and cruelty could inflict, with no relief to be afforded or invoked from the gallant officers of the Army because they dared not interfere without an application from the agent, too cowardly or timid to demand their assistance. Such a policy in the past has been fraught with the most shameful and shocking disregard of the calls of humanity and the unpardonable neglect of the Government, with its strong arm, to protect the citizen and relieve the sufferings of unoffending, helpless women and children.

Such scenes may occur again. It is high time that such a miserable policy should be abolished. The lessons so recently taught in chapters of cruelty, outrage, and blood inflicted upon the unoffending and unsuspecting people of Arizona and New Mexico by Geronimo and his band should be heeded by this body, and stir the hearts of members of Congress to a determination that laws should be enacted and a policy inaugurated that will preclude such atrocities in the future.

No better plan, in my judgment, can be devised than the appointment of Army officers to the positions indicated, and thus enable these officers, who are held responsible, to preserve the peace of the country.

It is not proposed by me to place the management of Indian affairs under control of the War Department, but simply to require that officers of the Army shall be detailed to act as Indian agents, and that such officers, or retired officers, be selected and assigned to the duties of agents and inspectors; and that the board of citizens now appointed as a commission to aid in the purchase and selection of goods and the school superintendent be selected from the retired-list.

I would favor an entire change and place the whole system under the control of the Army, but I fear it can not be done. What I now propose appears to me to be so proper I trust it may be acceded to.

If we are in earnest in our professions about reform and economy, if we desire to give employment to the officers of the Army in the line of their duty, if we wish to preserve the peace of the frontier and afford protection to the people, if it is desirable to create and build up an efficient Indian management relieved of the pernicious influence of politics, and infuse into it energy, honesty, and economy, the suggestions I make will meet with the favor of the members of this body.

In this connection it is worthy of remark that in a number of treaties with the Indians it is stipulated that officers of the Army are to be selected annually to act as inspectors and report upon the quantity and quality of the goods furnished them. This stipulation, I have always understood, was at the solicitation of the Indians, who had but little confidence in the honesty of their agents. Their contact and acquaintance with officers of the Army induced the belief that they would receive at their hands fair treatment.

Mr. Chairman, no stronger obligation can rest upon the Government than that of a faithful, just, and generous observance of the treaty stipulations entered into with these people, and I emphasize the statement that the United States should not only comply with these requirements, but should be just and generous in the interpretation and fulfillment of them. On the other hand, a strict compliance should be required of the Indians. In this connection I desire to call attention to several treaties for the purpose of showing how faithfully and literally the Government has met these obligations, and then show how far beyond these treaty requirements, to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, the provisions of this bill and many of its predecessors have gone; and while showing the enormous appropriations of money for the benefit of the Indians, in excess of their wants and not dreamed of when the treaties were made, I propose to show how the rights of our own people, intended to be protected by the treaties, have been shamefully neglected by Congress.

For this purpose I will cite the third paragraph of the first article of a treaty concluded with the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians on the 28th of October, 1868. It will be found beginning on page 129 of the Book of Indian Treaties. I will send it to the desk and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

If bad men among the Indians shall commit a wrong or depredation upon the person or property of any one, white, black, or Indian, subject to the authority of the United States and at peace therewith, the tribes herein named solemnly agree that they will, on proof made to their agent and notice by him, deliver up the wrong-doer to the United States to be punished according to its laws, and in case they willfully refuse so to do, the person injured shall be reimbursed for his loss from annuities or other moneys due or to become due to them under this or other treaties made with the United States. And the President, on advice with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, shall prescribe such rules and regulations for ascertaining damages under the provisions of this article as in his judgment may be proper. But no such damages shall be adjusted and paid until thoroughly examined and passed upon by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and no one sustaining loss while violating or because of his violating the provisions of this treaty or the laws of the United States shall be reimbursed therefor.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. This stipulation, agreed to by the Indians, notwithstanding the large sums appropriated for their benefit in excess of the obligations of the Government, has been constantly ignored by Congress; but as I expect to allude to this subject in subsequent remarks I will leave it for the present. Now, sir, let us examine a little further and see what obligations the Government assumed to these people. I will not detain the House by reading in full the different articles, but summarize them.

The seventh article of the treaty, a paragraph of which has just been read, requires a teacher to be furnished for every thirty children that shall be made to attend school; the ninth article provides that a physician, teacher, farmer, blacksmith, engineer, miller, and carpenter shall be furnished; the tenth article requires the Government for thirty years to annually pay the Indians $20,000, and the same article provides a certain amount and kind of clothing for each Indian, old and young.

Other articles require an agent and interpreter to be furnished, to reside among them; and a storehouse and buildings for the employés were to be erected.

The provisions of the bill before us appropriates the money for each one of these requirements, except in so far as they have heretofore been fulfilled.

The treaty made with the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches October 21, 1867, and found beginning on page 318 of this book, and the treaty with Northern Cheyennes and Northern Arapahoes, beginning on page 136, are precisely similar in all respects with the provisions of the treaty just referred to.

Such are the requirements in the several treaties with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, with the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches, and with the Northern Cheyennes and Northern Arapahoes. It will be found that similar provisions are in nearly all the treaties made since the conclusion of the civil war.

By an examination of the bill now being considered it will be found that appropriations are made to carry out these several requirements. When these treaties were concluded the Indians expected no more on the part of the Government.

Now, sir, in order to show how much greater and further the appropriations go, I will invite the attention of the committee to the Official Register, volume 1, for 1885; but before giving the details in respect to employés of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe agency I would have the committee remember that there were only an agent and interpreter, a physician, miller, teacher, farmer, engineer, blacksmith, and carpenter, and additional teachers for every thirty children going to school required by the treaty that should be provided by the Government.

On page 518 of the Register will be found the number and character of the employés at the Cheyenne and Arapahoe agency. In addition to the agent and others required there are thirty-eight employés, not promised or expected by the treaty. There is one clerk, $1,200; and one issue clerk at $900; two additional farmers at $75 per month each, $1,800; one herder at $900, and two additional herders at $480; one butcher, $480, and one assistant butcher, $180; three teamsters, $540; two apprentices, $240; three apprentices, $180; two assistant carpenters, $300; one assistant blacksmith, $180; three industrial teachers, one at $900, one at $600, and one at $480; two matrons, $960; two assistant matrons, $600; one laundryman, $360; two seamstresses, $750; four helpers, $240; one tailor, $150; one baker, $360; two cooks, $600; and, in addition to the six teachers, there is one school superintendent at $900.

The regular treaty employés are paid $8,500, and these thirty-eight additional ones are paid $14,000. Besides these forty-six employés there is a police force consisting of Captain Tall Bull, Lieutenant Black Coyote, and Sergeant Cedar Tree, and nineteen privates, including Bear Louse, Sleeping Wolf, Bobtail Bull, Yellow Calf, and Scabby Horse, receiving $10 and $8 each per month, at a cost of $2,184 per annum, making seventy-six salaried employés at that agency at a total cost of $22,864.

On page 524 will be found the employés for the Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita agency. Beside the agent and other employés required by the treaty, we find one additional farmer, one clerk, one superintendent and overseer, one herder, one additional farmer, two superintendents and principal teachers, two industrial teachers, three matrons, three seamstresses, three cooks, three laundresses, two helpers, and one baker; but we find no butchers. It is sad to think that other Indians are supplied with butchers and these are unprovided. We find the police here number thirty officers and privates, making sixty-nine employés at that agency at an expenditure about equal to that of the other agency.

By continuing the examination of the Official Register it will be found that the employés at the various agencies run from a few persons in some cases to as high as twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, and even more than sixty persons in others.

The total employés at the sixty agencies, outside of the police force, number 1,094, and the paid employés at the different training schools number 132, besides new ones provided for in this bill not on the Official Register. These added make 1,226, and this number added to the 770 constituting the police force swells the little army of employés in the Indian service to 1,996 persons, at a total cost to the Government of $831,000; of which sum $90,000 alone is for the Indian police. Deduct from this $831,000 $90,000, the police item, and there remains $741,000. Deduct from this sum $137,300 for pay of agents, interpreters, inspectors, and expenses of inspectors and there is left $603,700. Averaging the sixty agencies at $5,000 each, according to my calculation, for pay of physicians, clerks, farmers, engineers, blacksmiths, millers, carpenters, teamsters, and laborers, and you have a further sum to deduct of $300,000, leaving over $300,000 that goes to pay for teachers at the schools and employés used for the schools, including matrons, seamstresses, cooks, bakers, herders, &c. To the gross sum for pay of employés should be added $15,000 for five inspectors, and the pay for five special agents at $3 per day when on duty.

As the cooks, seamstresses, tailors, herders, butchers, apprentices, stablemen, superintendents of schools, additional farmers, &c., are not provided for in the treaties, under what head and from what source, let us inquire, are these large appropriations derived? Before turning to the bill to show the excuse for these things, I recur briefly again to some of the treaties.

Take the last treaty with the Cheyennes and Araphaoes, on page 132 of the Book of Treaties, seventh article, and you will find it says:

ART. 7. In order to insure the civilization of the tribes entering into this treaty, the necessity of education is admitted, especially by such of them as are or may be settled on said agricultural reservation, and they therefore pledge themselves to compel their children, male and female, between the ages of six and sixteen years, to attend school; and it is hereby made the duty of the agent for said Indians to see that this stipulation is strictly complied with; and the United States agrees that for every thirty children between said ages who can be induced or compelled to attend school a house shall be provided, and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished, who will reside among said Indians, and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less than twenty years.

It will be noticed that the section says, "in order to insure civilization" the necessity of education is admitted, and the agent is charged with the duty of seeing that the children attend school, and for every thirty so attending a teacher "competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished," &c. This word "civilization" no where else occurs in the treaty. The same language is used in article 4 of the treaty of May, 1868, with the Northern Cheyennes and Northern Arapahoes, and the word "civilization" occurs nowhere else in that treaty. The same language and same conditions apply in the treaty of August, 1868, with the Kiowa and Comanche Indians. I might continue and show the same modest language in respect to "civilization" and "education" in other treaties, sometimes where only one teacher is required, and again where an additional teacher is required for every thirty children attending school.

Then, sir, may I not ask, was it ever contemplated that these unpretentious requirements in the treaties for agents, interpreters, physicians, engineers, farmers, teachers, blacksmiths, carpenters, and millers should be supplemented with from twenty-five to sixty additional employés, including butchers to slaughter animals for the most expert butchers in the world, whose training from infancy has been in this particular line of work; for cooks to prepare dainty food for a people reared on raw and half-roasted food; bakers to prepare bread for savages who were raised on roasted acorns and mesquite beans; for herders to attend cattle for the most perfect horsemen on earth; for tailors and seamstresses and laundresses to cut and make garments and keep them nicely laundried for people who wear breech-clouts and blankets, and industrial teachers for the laziest creatures on earth.

In answer to this it may be said that these butchers, cooks, tailors, herders, bakers, laundresses, matrons, and seamstresses are not used for the Indians, but are used for the employés and industrial schools. If this is so it is high time an end was put to it. Why should not the agent, physician, and other employés provide for their own butchering, cooking, washing, laundrying, &c.? Their salaries are sufficiently high for this purpose; besides, it is not expected that the Government will keep a hotel for their accommodation. Instead of a tailor to cut the garments, seamstresses to make them, and laundresses to wash and iron for the pupils, these things should be done by themselves or their people. It is a premium offered to idleness. In this connection I would say that the Indian women are noted for fine embroidery of silk and beads on cloth and buckskin. The finest made buckskin hunting-shirt I ever saw, glittering with beads and silk of various colors, with collar and cuffs of otter fur, was made by wild Comanche squaws.

For the purposes of civilization only a teacher is required who can teach the ordinary elements of an English education; then, I ask, where is the authority or necessity of having one grand chief superintendent of schools at a salary of $3,000 and necessary traveling expenses of such superintendent, and one or more superintendents at the different agencies at good round salaries, besides the great number of industrial teachers? Why, when only this ordinary English education is stipulated for, should more than a million of dollars be appropriated for industrial schools and for training schools at points thousands of miles from their homes, necessitating extraordinary appropriations for transportation? No more stupendous folly, no more wasteful use of the people's money was ever perpetrated.

Now, sir, let us examine this bill and see to what immense uses this word "civilization" and its unpretentious meaning as used in the treaties has been applied; and while showing this you will find, in part, under what head such vast sums are derived to keep up these costly and useless establishments called Indian agencies and industrial schools.

Beginning on page 33 of the bill, the first paragraph of that page reads: "For the support and civilization of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas, $325,000."

Some of the treaties already referred to were made with these tribes, and this sum is in addition to the several sums for annuities, for goods, for pay of agents, interpreters, physicians, teachers, farmers, millers, blacksmiths, engineers, and carpenters, that are provided for in the treaties and appropriated for in previous sections of the bill.

Under this head of "miscellaneous supports" there are thirty-four paragraphs of a similar nature, sometimes varying the words "for the support and civilization of" to the terms "support, education, and civilization of," and sometimes "to promote the civilization and comfort," and in others for their "instruction and civilization."

In these thirty-four paragraphs where the words "support and civilization," "education," "comfort," and "instruction" are used there are appropriations amounting to $1,061,300.

Would it not be interesting to know how much of this is for support, how much for civilization, how much for education, how much for instruction, and how much for comfort? Suppose that one-third of this $1,061,300 is to be used for "education," "civilization" and "instruction," and you have the sum of $300,000 appropriated for the support and maintenance of the schools at the agencies.

Under the head of incidental expenses, beginning on page 38, we find $132,000 are appropriated. There are twelve paragraphs, all of which read for incidental expenses and traveling expenses of agents; and of the twelve paragraphs seven of them include items for "support and civilization." Here you have jumbled up $132,000 for incidentals, pay of employés, support and civilization, and expenses of agents in traveling, &c. The incidentals should be specific, the traveling expenses and support and civilization should each be specific.

It will be remembered that previous paragraphs of this bill under treaty requirements and in addition thereto, as already shown, have provided appropriations for education, schools, and teachers amounting to more than $100,000, besides over $300,000 out of $1,061,000, when support and education and civilization and instruction and comfort are all mixed up in one indistinguishable mass as to what amount is intended to be applied under the respective terms.

This brings me to the consideration of the crowning shame and folly of this miserable and farcical Indian policy.

On page 42 of the bill, under the head of "support for schools," we find the first paragraph appropriates for "day and industrial schools and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for; for the purchase, construction, and repair of school buildings; and for the purchase of horses, cattle, and sheep, goats and swine for schools, $700,000.

For support of pupils, purchase of materials, erection of shops, and necessary outbuildings at Chilocco, Ind. T., $34,125.

For Indian pupils in Alaska, $15,000.

For industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., and for transportation of pupils to and from school, &c., $81,000.

For industrial school, two hundred pupils, at Salem, Oreg., pay of superintendent, completion of school building, outbuildings, repairs and fencing, $40,000.

For support of pupils at Genoa, Nebr., $29,750.

For support and education of one hundred and twenty pupils at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

For support and education of three hundred and fifty pupils at Lawrence, Kans., pay of superintendent $2,000 per annum, purchase of material, erection of shops, cottages, outbuildings, and repairs; in all, $68,000.

For support and education of two hundred pupils at Lincoln, Pa., $33,400.

For care, support, and education of three hundred Indian pupils at other schools in the Territories, and other States, $50,100.

For transportation of pupils to and from schools, and to place them under the control of suitable white families, $28,000.

Total $1,099,417, which, added to the $400,000 before appropriated for schools and their support, for civilization, education, and instruction, makes the enormous sum of $1,499,000 to promote the education and civilization of the wild Indian children of the country.

The number of Indian pupils thus provided for at Salem, Hampton, Lawrence, Lincoln, and other States and Territories, is 1,170, the number for Chilocco, at Carlisle and Genoa is not specified, but judging from the large amounts appropriated for these places there will be nearly as many more, say a total of two thousand. This extraordinary provision of $1,099,417 is over and above multiplied thousands before provided in the bill for schools, education, civilization, and instruction. Not counting the $15,000 for Alaska there is $351,000 appropriated for two thousand children at the schools not within the reservations. Outside of Alaska our Indian population is estimated at 260,000. So that by the provisions of this bill largely over $1,000,000 is appropriated for the support, education, and civilization of less than 40,000 Indian children of scholastic age. No part of these appropriations is intended for the five civilized nations, as they have their own academies and schools, supported out of their own funds. Therefore, at least 60,000 should be deducted from the 260,000, leaving 200,000 as the entire population, the children of which get the benefit of these extraordinary sums. Now let us see how many of these children there are. Persons acquainted with the Indians know that they are not prolific. I estimate in this number of 200,000 uncivilized Indians 80,000 fathers and mothers, children of scholastic age 40,000, and under and over scholastic age 80,000. I am satisfied this estimate is rather over than under the true figures.

Mr. Nelson, a member of the committee, in his very interesting speech informs us there are 36,000 children of scholastic age, and 9,000 attending school. This shows the appropriations to be out of all proportion as to good results.

I hold in my hand the report of the State board of education for Texas, also the reports of the comptroller and treasurer, showing the scholastic population of that State for the year ending August 31, 1884, white and colored, amounting to 274,466, representing an estimated population of over two millions of people, and taxable values $520,000,000. There are few States in the Union with a more liberally supported system of common schools than that of Texas.

At the date to which I refer our permanent State school fund, in interest-bearing bonds and interest-bearing land notes and cash in the treasury, amounted to nearly $10,000,000, the accruing interest upon which only can be used.

This permanent fund is increasing daily from the sales and leases of 25,000,000 acres of school lands, and in addition thereto we have a State tax of 12½ cents on the $100 worth of real and personal property, and a poll-tax that goes to the support of common schools. With this magnificent fund and taxation our State, for the year referred to, could appropriate from the State funds only $1,235,097 for the education of two hundred and seventy-four thousand four hundred and sixty-six children within the scholastic age, being greatly less than is appropriated by this bill for the education, support, and transportation of less than forty thousand Indian children, and only nine thousand of them attending schools. It is proper to state that in addition to the permanent State school fund in Texas, and State taxes for support of schools, we have a permanent county fund, besides city and corporation taxes. This simple statement of facts as to number of Indian children and the large sums appropriated for their education will be so startling to the tax-payers of the country that comment is unnecessary. It shows such an extraordinary waste and useless extravagance that language fails to describe it. Comment would be superfluous.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that this appropriation is useless and extravagant. I say so because it is money thrown away. The utmost we can expect to do in the way of education for the Indian is to make the effort to teach him the elements of an ordinary English education. This is provided for in the treaties, and should be faithfully carried out. You can not make a Christian out of a Jew or a Mohammedan, nor can you make a Jew or a Mohammedan out of a Christian. Their religious principles have been grounded into them by centuries and ages of teaching, habits, thoughts, and associations; no more can you change in a day or a generation the teachings, habits, thoughts, and associations of the untutored savage of the mountains and plains.

For centuries they have been reared in the belief that the more atrocities they commit, the more scalps wrung from their foes, the greater their reward in the happy hunting grounds of the hereafter. To illustrate this, I will recount to you a scene I witnessed in 1865, where twenty thousand of these wild people were assembled for the purpose of negotiating treaties with the Confederate States, the State of Texas, and that portion of the five civilized nations that were allied with the confederacy during the civil war.

The commissioners on the part of the southern confederacy tried to induce the Indians to sign an article in the treaty that they would never cross to the south side of Red River, urging as a reason for this request that the people of Texas could not distinguish one Indian from another, as they all dressed and looked alike; that if the Indians making the treaty would agree to the proposition, the people of Texas would know when they saw an Indian south of that stream that he was an enemy and not a friend, that it would avoid mistakes and prevent collision with friends.

With one voice the chiefs participating in the council protested against this proposition. The debate, pro and con, on both sides, was long and animated. Finally one of the prominent chiefs, of fine form and features, of dignified mien, with great gravity addressed the Confederate States commissioners and the chiefs of the civilized tribes who sat in council with them and said:

MY FRIENDS: When the Great Spirit created the white man He endowed him with qualities different from those He bestowed upon my people. He made the white man to labor with his hands, to cultivate the earth and make it produce corn and wheat for his subsistence. He created him with power to turn streams of water on the thirsty valleys to enrich and vivify the soil, so that he would not only reap abundant harvest but beautify his home. He gave him an inventive genius, so that he could build houses, create villages, and rear great cities. He bestowed him with the faculty to make all kinds of tools and implements with which to build houses, cultivate the soil, and erect great workshops. He gave him the power to catch the lightning's flash, and with it talk to his friends in distant places; to build great wagons that breathe fire and force their way with the speed of the wind across the plains, through the valleys, and over the mountain-tops. These things I have not seen with mine own eyes, but my brothers who have been to see the Great Father in Washington, have seen them.

Your people build ships that cross the great waters and visit the peoples of strange lands; you make the most terrible and destructive weapons of war. The Great Spirit gave you all these qualities, and gave you the rich spots of earth where the rains fall, and made for your use cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, and fowls. But, my friends, when He created the red man, He made him for a widely different purpose and gave him only simple and untutored habits. He did not intend him to labor with his hands for a support. He filled the rushing waters from the mountains with fish, and made the deer, the antelope, the bear, and the buffalo for his support. Instead of making him with a genius like the white man's to be devoted to the arts of peace, He created him with simple tastes and warlike instincts, that he might live by the chase, by war, and by violence. He taught him to live by stealth, and to take from his enemies by force whatever he wanted. For generations and ages back, far beyond the memory and tradition of our people, we have been brought up in the belief that stealing is right, and the more scalps we take from our foes, the more prisoners we capture, the better and more inviting will be the hunting grounds to which we go after death. The Great Spirit made for our use the wolf, the bear, and the buffalo; their meat supplies us with food, and their skins with raiment and material for our wigwams. He gave us these boundless plains from the mountains to the Rio Grande as our domain upon which to roam, where there are no forests, and where the rain seldom falls.

When the cold winds of autumn blow and the leaves begin to fall, the buffalo leaves the Great Lakes and the mountains and travels south, crossing the Missouri River, the Platte, the Arkansas, the Canadian, and Red River, and continues south to the waters of the Brazos, the Colorado, and the Concho, where the winds are soft and the grass green, and there remains until the warm days of spring approach; and then he takes up his march northward and pursues it until he is again upon the waters of the Missouri and Mississippi.

As we can not live in the north in the winter and without the buffalo for support, we are compelled to travel with them as they journey to the south or north. Therefore, if we were to sign this article in the treaty, as you desire, and agree not to go south of Red River, when the buffalo reaches that stream in his southern march he would know nothing of this treaty and such a promise, and would cross over and disappear from our view, while we and our squaws and little children would linger, and shiver, and starve on the northern bank through all the cold months of winter.

My friends, I hope you will see in this plain and simple statement of the truth that your proposition involves a question which to us is one of life or death. We are to-day making a treaty of peace and friendship with you, and with our red brothers of the woods here. We propose to make a great white road of peace between your country and our country, where there shall be no more briars and brambles, no more stains of blood and bleaching bones; but a broad, clean road of peace, as white and pure as the snow from the sky.

We have invoked the Great Spirit to fill our hearts and your hearts with the desire for peace, so that this good end may be accomplished. We hope the Great Spirit will incline your hearts not to press this proposition, fraught with so much mischief to our people. We are making peace with you and our brothers, and will not steal your horses and mules, capture your women and children, or murder your people any more; but we can not live, except by stealing, by war and violence. We have been stealing from the people of Mexico, killing their people, and capturing their women and children always. Our fathers, and their fathers before them, did it, and we must continue to do it.

We can not get to Mexico without crossing Red River, and, to tell you the truth, my young men are now eager for the warpath and hungry for mules and horses, and as soon as we finish this treaty with you and our friends here we are going directly to Mexico.

Mr. Chairman, this is no fanciful sketch, but an actual occurrence.

Such was the speech, and the impression created by it was so profound and striking that the confederate commissioners no longer pressed the proposition.

That savage warrior but expressed the convictions of his heart, and gave utterance to sentiments and feelings inherited from a long line of ancestors that had been inculcated by centuries of teaching, habit, and practice, which can not be eradicated or changed in him or his immediate offspring except by slow, patient, and long-continued processes.

You may take his child and educate him at Carlisle or Hampton, and keep him for years in fretful exile, surrounded by the highest types of civilization, and teach his unwilling hands to learn the handicraft of the white man; but when he returns to his people the longings of his heart will be gratified by returning to the ways of his fathers. Scarcely one in one hundred of those so educated will appreciate the advantages forced on them. On the contrary, in many instances this contact with civilization has rendered them the most cunning and treacherous of their race.

I speak especially of the plains and mountain Indians; there is as marked a distinction between those Indians and the Indians that formerly inhabited the country between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi River as there is between the ferocious wolves of the plains and the dogs of our households. The Indians found by our ancestors on the shores of New England, along the Atlantic and Gulf coast, on the Ohio, the Wabash, and the Mississippi, on the Tennessee and Cumberland, while they lived by the chase and were addicted to war, yet all of them, to some extent, cultivated vines and raised corn and beans, and tobacco where it would grow. No seed was ever planted, no vine was ever cultivated by those to whom I refer.

Philip and Powhatan, the Six Nations, Tecumseh and his people, the Cherokees and Creeks, the Seminoles, the Chickasaws and Choctaws, the Pottawatomies and Miamies, the Shawnees and Delawares, Black Hawk and his people, all lived in regions of vast forests, in the richest valleys, and where the mountain tops were covered with gigantic trees, and in a region where the dews and rains made the earth prolific. The others are the Arabs of America, inhabiting for ages a vast treeless and almost waterless desert, only penetrated at distant intervals by large streams having their sources in the mountains, the very summits of which for hundreds and hundreds of miles are undulating plateaus, as treeless and barren as the plains extending from the Missouri River waters to the Rio Grande. The Indians inhabiting the country at the sources of the great rivers that flow from the west, and along the borders of these streams, are as different in their natures and as distinct and marked in their characteristics from those on the Atlantic coast, and streams that flow from the east into the Mississippi, as the two sections of country are different in all their aspects of soil, climate, and production.

Even these eastern Indians, who have been in contact with civilization for two hundred years and more, and many of them surrounded by it for generations, and who have had the civilizing influences of Christianity inculcated among them by tireless and devoted missionaries all these long years, have made slow and weary progress. With some, through a half century of peace, a happy work has been accomplished, and to-day is yielding rich fruits; with others, where the same processes have been patiently invoked, a barely perceptible progress has been made. But few of these, if any, have increased in numbers, and others, once strong and powerful tribes, have almost faded from existence.

We should learn from these painful and sad teachings that you can not, in a day or generation, transpose these people from habits and notions woven into them by centuries of teaching, association, and practice, into the ways and habits of our race.

But, sir, I have detained the committee much longer on this point than I intended. Before I conclude I shall ask your attention briefly to the gross injustice you mete out to people who were intended to be protected by the treaties I have cited, while you are lavish in your expenditures for a people who have brought ruin and desolation upon thousands of your own countrymen who look to you for protection. In the early part of my remarks I called attention to those articles in the treaties requiring indemnity to be made out of Indian appropriations when our people suffered loss by reason of depredations.

Mr. Chairman, there are now pending claims for Indian depredations as far back as 1847. These claims have been increasing from that day to the present until now they amount to more than $10,000,000. Some five millions or more of these have been acted upon by the Indians in council, by the agents, the Indian Bureau, and Secretary of the Interior, and been approved, and year after year sent up to Congress for action. During all these long years of weary waiting you have appropriated millions in excess of what is required of you for the Indians, and turned a deaf ear to the entreaties of your own suffering countrymen. It is only now and then that one of these claims has been paid. How much longer are our injured people to wait on the action of the guardians of their rights? Sir, no greater wrong, no more flagrant outrage was ever inflicted upon a long-suffering class of people than has been shamefully meted out by Congress to the claimants referred to. Let us be just and merciful to our own flesh and blood before we waste millions for the education of a savage race, when it can, at most, accomplish but little good.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion allow me to present in the briefest possible manner my solution of the Indian problem. What I would do so far as this bill is concerned, if the rules permit, would be to insert a provision at its close requiring Army officers, at the end of this fiscal year, to be detailed and selected from the retired-list to act as agents, special agents, inspectors, superintendents of schools, and as commissioners to assist in the purchase of goods and overlooking contracts, and non-commissioned officers and privates to act as clerks at the agencies and as a police force, and a further provision that the appropriations for the industrial schools and the other schools at Hampton, Carlisle, Genoa, Salem, Lincoln, and all of them, should cease with the end of this fiscal year. This would give timely notice to all concerned and prepare the way for reform and economy. It would be better to pass a resolution by the House instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to bring in a bill carefully prepared for this purpose.

The next great step to accomplish reform, economy, and energy in the Indian service would be, with their consent, to erect the five civilized nations into a Territory, giving them a governor from among their own people, allowing them a Territorial Legislature, that is already provided for by treaties, giving such Legislature jurisdiction of all matters affecting their interests with the General Government, and regulating intercourse among themselves; give them a Delegate on this floor, elected alternately from the several nations, to represent their wishes and interests; and as the less civilized tribes of the Territory are prepared for it admit them into this Territorial government; leave these civilized nations as free to control and dispose of their lands, according to their own views and wishes, as were the people of Kentucky and Texas; allow their national authorities, governors, Legislatures, and courts to administer and execute their own laws, protect the rights of their people, and attend to their own domestic concerns as freely and fully as they are doing to-day; extend the civil as well as the criminal jurisdiction of the Federal courts over them in the same manner as it is extended over the other organized Territories of the country; extend to them citizenship and the protection of life, liberty, and property, as amply as the Constitution and laws extend it over our own people; abolish their agency and deal with them like you do with other free and intelligent people who have churches, and schools, and academies scattered everywhere among them. Do these things, and it will be but a few years until you will have another Territory knocking at your doors for admittance into the sisterhood of States that will be as fair and peerless in all that constitutes a grand and noble State as any now in this galaxy of States.

In respect to other tribes, comply in the most liberal manner with all treaty obligations, and with the weak and needy go beyond this; curtail their reservations, with their consent, by giving an equivalent, but do not crowd them on the same area of land upon which white men would make a comfortable support; enact laws authorizing and requiring the Department to lease portions of their reservations for grazing purposes, utilizing the rich grasses that should not be allowed to go to waste and decay, and by such means affording employment to the Indians as herders and learning them the value of cattle, at the same time making profitable these large tracts of country by producing cheap beef for the millions of toilers of the country, and thus creating a revenue that will largely contribute to the support of the Indians; discontinue the vast sums you have been appropriating for industrial and boarding schools and for the support of sinecures in office, and cut off the large sums for transportation; let them attend their own home schools and the schools of religious denominations among them, and when there is found now and then a bright pupil who would appreciate better advantages send him to an academy in one of the civilized nations, where they exist and are conducted under the auspices of Indians—by encouraging these schools and placing the young savage among his kind, where he will feel more at home; encourage all religious denominations to establish churches and schools among them, and aid these religious schools in a moderate and prudent way; dispense with every civilian employé at the agencies except the interpreters, physicians, engineers, teachers, farmers, millers, carpenters, and blacksmiths required by the treaties. Detail from the Army and take from the retired-list officers to serve as agents, inspectors, and superintendents, and non-commissioned officers or privates to act as clerks. Abolish the Indian police, and instead of encouraging them to ride about in idleness and depend upon the Government for rations and a salary teach them to rely upon their own exertions for a support, and detail non-commissioned officers and privates, changing them from time to time, to act as a police and keep from among the Indians bad white men who violate the intercourse laws; let the Government protect them from the greed of white men who seek a lodgment among them with a view to despoil them of their substance; allot their lands in severalty among them, not by force, but when it is desired, and teach them to value homes that shall not be taken from them, and upon which they may realize the hopes and aspirations of free and independent men, and where their labor will be bestowed for their own comfort without the fear of loss or interference with their concerns and pursuits. Do these things with the wilder tribes and teach them to rely on their own exertions, and by patient persistence in this policy you will gradually make progress with the present generation and greatly elevate succeeding ones.

And lastly, I would suggest a commission to be organized under the direction of the Interior Department whose duty it shall be to investigate the Indian depredation claims as is now being done under the directions of the act of last Congress, but instead of reporting the claims back to Congress give them the powers of a court of equity and authorize them to send for additional evidence if deemed necessary on the part of the Government, with the right of the claimant to introduce additional testimony, and as each claim is finally made up direct a judgment to be rendered by such commission, and when that judgment is rendered make it final. If in favor of the claimant for any sum, the name of the party and tribe of Indians committing the depredation and the amount found to be due to be certified to Congress for an appropriation to pay the same. Out of the sales to the Government of the surplus reservations of the several tribes the Government should be reimbursed for any payments made under the provisions of this regulation.

The Government having been at fault so long in not withholding sufficient sums to pay the approved depredation claims should proceed at once to discharge its obligations to its own people, and no longer delay an act of justice so strongly demanded by every reason of humanity, honesty, and fair dealing. The economies and reforms proposed by me would be just and generous to all the nations and tribes of Indians with whom we have treaty relations; they respond in a fair and liberal spirit to the promptings and demands of humanity; it would enable the Government, without imposing new burdens upon its Treasury, to meet just obligations long since due to its own despoiled, long-suffering citizens; it would result in much needed reforms of abuses that have for many years been corrupting a part of the civil service of the Government, and infuse into our Indian management an energy and efficiency sadly needed and which would result in the greatest good to every interest concerned.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague may be extended to enable him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the Chair will recognize me in the absence of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] I will yield such time as the gentleman from Texas may require to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I yield now such time to the gentleman from Texas as he desires.

Mr. THROCKMORTON then resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the remainder of my time for the purpose of yielding it to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has forty-eight minutes of his time remaining.

The motion of Mr. WELLBORN was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. LOWRY, for one week, on account of important business; and to Mr. BAKER, for Wednesday next and the balance of the week, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. WELLBORN (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with law, a list of names and compensation of persons employed in the Treasury Department during the year ending December 31, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. What is it in response to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the regular statement of the Treasury Department as to employés and their compensation.

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be so referred. The doubt the Chair had about it was whether the paper itself, a large document, ought not to be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of March 3, 1886, certain information in regard to the sinking fund; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA RIVER LANDS.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to withdraw for the present from sale and occupation, under any of the land laws of the United States, all lands of the United States lying on and along the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon, and in Washington Territory, adjacent to the obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River, at the Cascades of the Columbia, and also at The Dalles of the Columbia for a distance from said river at said points respectively of 500 feet from low-water mark.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1884–'85 there be printed 6,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 12,000 copies for the use of the House, and 20,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1622) to prohibit any officer, agent, or servant of the Government of the United States of America to hire or contract out the labor of prisoners incarcerated for violating the laws of the Government of the United States of America;

A bill (H. R. 5874) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 18) for the further distribution of the report of the Public Land Commission.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. PLUMB. If the morning business has been concluded——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate a resolution which comes over from yesterday as a part of the morning business. It is the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LOGAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of James B. Eads be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that they be instructed to thoroughly investigate the charge contained therein.

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is absent, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Kansas to allow me to make a response to that resolution, in view of what appears in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. PLUMB. The reason I know the Senator from Virginia will understand. I do not desire to commit myself to anything now that would lead to a promiscuous debate. If the resolution lies over, of course when it properly comes up in the next morning call the Senator from Virginia will have an opportunity then to be heard.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I hope the Senator will not make a motion that is not debatable in view of what appears in the RECORD this morning in that letter.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Illinois not being here, it seems to me the Senator from Virginia himself will see——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Illinois put the letter on record without offering a motion or a resolution preceding it, and therefore I am not indebted——

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not insist upon taking up the resolution, as my colleague is absent. He will probably be in the Chamber in a few moments.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The letter was put in the RECORD yesterday in a manner that no other letter, I undertake to say, ever found its way into a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It charges me with downright falsehood. I am ready to meet the Senator from Illinois at any time on this floor in debate on the proposition that I made, and I think it is due to me that I should have the earliest opportunity to explain to the Senate how this matter crept into the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not suppose that anybody desires to prevent him from meeting the resolution or the mover of it. I only made the suggestion as a matter of courtesy to my colleague, who will probably be in the Senate directly, and then the Senator from Virginia will have an opportunity of meeting him in a discussion of the resolution as he chooses. I have no desire to prevent the Senator from making any statement he sees proper about it. I only suggest, as a matter of courtesy to the mover of the resolution, that the Senator from Virginia should delay his remarks until he comes in.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will do that with the understanding that when he shall come in the matter may be taken up by unanimous consent. If that is understood, I will yield.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 149.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia desire the Chair to put to the Senate the question as to whether he shall have unanimous consent?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I take it for granted, no one objecting, that I have unanimous consent. I should like to have it so stated, for I shall not yield the floor without that being understood.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he ask, or I will ask, that, the resolution being now in order, it be informally laid aside subject to call, and then whenever the Senator chooses to call it up he may do so.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I should not like to interrupt a regular debate on some general question.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the Senator ought to do that.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well; I assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 149, being the bill which was under consideration yesterday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the arrangement of the Senate by unanimous consent was that there was some resolution which was informally laid aside and that this business was to be taken up by consent without motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the understanding of the Chair. The suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was adopted, and the bill mentioned by the Senator from Kansas is now before the Senate subject to be displaced.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], on which the Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, when I was interrupted yesterday by the expiration of the morning hour I was proceeding to show the good faith of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company in terminating the construction of their road at Le Mars, having at that point met a constructed land-grant road from Le Mars to Sioux City, their southwestern terminus, pursuing the very route which the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company would have been compelled to follow if they had extended their road. Having terminated the construction of their road at Le Mars, distant from the northern Iowa line 56.13 miles or thereabouts, they would be entitled to the grant of lands prescribed by the act of Congress if they were entitled to an allowance for a fraction of 10 miles. It is claimed that for this fraction of the road they can not be allowed the lands granted by the act of Congress, because the act prescribed that the State should only certify lands to this company upon the construction of each 10 miles of the road.

In illustration of the good faith of the company it will readily suggest itself to the Senate that they might have avoided this difficulty by constructing three miles and a half of road beyond the town of Le Mars, and that would have been a literal compliance with the act of Congress. Yet it would have been of no public benefit, it would have been of no interest whatever to the people of that section of country, and it would have been an injury, a positive injury, to the town of Le Mars, to which they had already constructed their road. So it is evident that the company, whatever course they have pursued in this matter, have acted in good faith.

But further than that, they did not desire to retain the lands appropriated for the remaining portion of the road and prevent settlers from going onto that land. In 1882, I myself introduced a bill in the Senate "to resume to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," which embraced all the surplus land which would be appropriated to a road from Le Mars to Sioux City. The company have been entirely willing; they have been ready to surrender these lands to the United States to remove all difficulty, so that the Government could resume them, because they saw that it would not be to the public interest to attempt to construct their road farther. This bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, but it was not deemed necessary to act upon it. At a subsequent session of Congress a similar bill was introduced by myself and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Thus it appears that this company have done whatever they could to place these lands in the possession of the Government and to afford settlers an opportunity of going upon the lands, asking only that they receive the amount of lands to which they were entitled under the act of Congress for each mile of the road actually constructed and put in operation and running to this day as a part of the great railroad system of the Northwest.

There are some further facts which should be taken into consideration in determining this question. This land grant was passed in 1864. At that time all this region of country was comparatively uninhabited. The frontier had not gone so far west as the line of the Sioux City and Saint Paul road. But two years before the passage of this act of Congress, but a short distance east of the line of this road, on the very boundary line of the State of Iowa, the first murder in the Sioux massacre occurred. Adventurous settlers in small numbers had gone then beyond the line of the frontier. A family had settled on Spirit Lake, in the State of Iowa, just south of the boundary line, and the first alarm that was received by the people of the Northwest from the Indians who attacked the white settlers was on the borders of that Spirit Lake. In 1862 the great Sioux massacre, which desolated all that country, which spread terror and alarm throughout the whole region, originated on the shores of that beautiful lake. The track of murder and outrage and desolation extended from there northeast on the very line of this road, up to within 75 miles of Saint Paul, spreading death and destruction all through that country, driving all the settlers who had been there from their homes, and the country remained desolate for years afterward.

It was under circumstances of this kind that Congress adopted the policy of granting public lands for the construction of railroads through that country. It was in order that the people might have the means of transportation and of protection on the frontier that these land grants were made. It was to invite settlers into that country again; it was to enable them to go there and build their homes and protect themselves and that the Government might extend to them the protection which it could do by the construction of these railroads through that country. For that purpose these lands were granted. They were taken from the public domain and appropriated to that purpose in the interest of the settlement and development of that interesting and beautiful country; and they succeeded in doing so. All the section of Northwestern Iowa and Southwestern Minnesota and all the country west of the Missouri River soon filled up, soon became the sites of good homes, soon became intelligent, industrious communities, and the country prospered. It was under circumstances of this kind that this company undertook to build this road, and not because there was other business inviting it, business paying it for the construction of the road, and it asks only that justice be done in regard to this matter.

Now that these circumstances have all changed, now that there are prosperous and thriving and densely settled communities in that region of country, it is anything but fair to say that the land granted and appropriated at that time for the construction of roads so beneficial to the community, which have resulted in such incalculable benefit to the people, shall be denied to the railroad companies.

Mr. President, I suppose the Government has no desire to do injustice here; I suppose no portion of the State of Iowa desires to do injustice; and yet what is the proposition here? It is not that the Treasury of the United States shall receive any benefit from these lands; neither the Government nor the railroad company nor the persons interested in this grant desire any profit to the Treasury of the United States arising from this land grant. They desire that the settlers have these lands, and that they have them on the most advantageous terms that can be proposed to them. Therefore this bill proposes that all the lands to which this company is not entitled shall be appropriated to the settlers who have gone onto them or that shall go onto them. They are brought within the public domain. Persons who have gone onto them as homestead settlers or as pre-emptors under the terms of this bill can obtain title by the payment of the ordinary price established by the laws of the Government in payment for the ordinary public lands. Yet these lands have been greatly enhanced in value; by the very construction of these roads, by the building up of these communities these lands are worth now not the dollar and a quarter per acre, but they are worth from five to fifty dollars an acre, and in some instances much more, but let the settlers have these lands, let them have all that do not belong fairly and justly to the railroad company which has earned the grant under the act of Congress.

The Secretary of the Interior in his letter seems to assume that the company is entitled to lands for each mile of the road actually constructed, for he says in the communication of the 6th of February, 1883, embraced in the report of the Committee on Public Lands:

Referring to these several communications—

Which have been mentioned in a preceding part of the letter—

Referring to these several communications, it appears that the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company built 56½ miles of road. This would entitle the company prima facie to 360,000 acres of land.

Then he goes on to discuss some other questions in regard to the grant; so that it seems to have been considered by public authority that this company was entitled to lands for each mile of road built; and the State of Iowa has done nothing whatever inconsistent with that. No expression of the State of Iowa has been made interfering with the construction of the grant, which would be in favor of the company to the extent I have indicated.

This leaves for the settlers betweeen 85,000 and 86,000 acres of land all through that country of great value, and this amount of land the company desires to place in the hands of the actual settlers. Why should it not be done? So far as I am concerned I ask for the adoption of this amendment only because I believe it to be an act of sheer justice, for the company is entitled to it except for perhaps a technicality which might exist if this reference were made to the courts of justice without any modification of the law. The grant to the State of Iowa prescribed that in the disposition of these lands the States should certify to the company only upon the completion of 10 miles of the road. It does not deny, however, to the State the grant for each mile of road built. A court bound by the technicalities of the law would perhaps be compelled to prevent the company from obtaining a legal title to these lands; but the Senate of the United States, it seems to me, can not afford here to rest upon a mere technicality. These parties have earned the land, and the only reason they are not entitled to the legal title under the law in compliance with its strictest letter is because they deemed it a matter of good faith to stop within a section of 10 miles in the construction of the road.

I trust the Senate will come to this view of the question and will adopt the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, obtained the floor.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds the Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS' OFFICE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
March 10, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of March 9, namely—

"Whereas the following resolution was presented and passed on the 4th instant, to wit: 'That each Senator shall report to the Senate on Monday next the name of his private secretary;' and

"Whereas an amendment was offered, accepted, and prevailed that said report should appear in the RECORD on Monday, March 8; and

"Whereas but seventeen Senators report the names of their private secretaries: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be required to report tomorrow the names of the private secretaries of Senators who had certificates of appointment from his office on March 4, and the names of the Senators who had appointed them, other than those whose reports appear in the RECORD of this date"—

I have the honor to transmit the accompanying statement.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. CANADAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the statement attached, will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The list?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication has been read; and the list will be read if the Senator from Virginia desires.

The Secretary read as follows:

Statement under resolution of March 9, 1886.

Name of private secretary.	By whom appointed.
John Irwin	Hon. J. H. Mitchell.
E. B. Wight	Hon. N. W. Aldrich.
P. S. George	Hon. J. Z. George.
R. M. Call	Hon. Wilkinson Call.
R. M. Larner	Hon. A. P. Gorman.
George Gilliland	Hon. D. W. Voorhees.
R. B. Green	Hon. Richard Coke.
E. D. Martin	Hon. E. K. Wilson.
M. G. Seckendorff	Hon. J. Chace.
M. S. Quay	Hon. J. D. Cameron.
S. B. Long	Hon. S. B. Maxey.
F. P. Ferris	Hon. C. H. Van Wyck.
S. Hutchins	Hon. M. W. Ransom.
R. B. Cooke	Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn.

Cards were issued to the above private secretaries under section 2, Rule XXXIII of the Senate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. CANADAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, a brief statement will answer my purpose in submitting a reply to the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota.

On the 12th of May, 1864, Congress passed an act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, the first section of which reads as follows:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City, in said State, to the south line of the State of Minnesota, at such point as the said State of Iowa may select, between the Big Sioux and the West Fork of the Des Moines River.

For that purpose that land grant was made. The Sioux City and Saint Paul Company entered into agreement to construct that line of railroad from Sioux City to the south line of the State of Minnesota. That company and the State were confined to a limit of fifteen years in which to construct that road. Neither the company nor the State, singly or combined, has or have constructed that road in accordance with the terms of the act. It might have been reasonably implied that the construction of the line should commence at Sioux City and proceed toward the southern boundary of the State of Minnesota. The company did not commence the construction at Sioux City, but at the south line of the State of Minnesota. It may be that there is a reason easily ascertainable why the construction should have been commenced at that point instead of the other. Much of the public land had been disposed of on the lower part, or Sioux City portion, of the line. Consequently the construction of the first several sections of 10 miles would not have caused the company to have received the sections provided for by the act, because they had been otherwise disposed of. Therefore it is fair to presume that the company commenced at the south line of the State of Minnesota where they could get nearly a full grant, and proceeded southward until they reached the point at Le Mars.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The object in doing that was to continue the construction of a line of road from Saint Paul southwest; so that the people would have the benefit of the entire line through the State of Iowa to Saint Paul, building a continuation of the Saint Paul line down to the Missouri River.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly; but it would have been just as convenient to have pursued the construction from Le Mars or from a point 3 miles west where they located their line to Sioux City, but for some reason the company stopped their construction at Le Mars. What was the reason? On the last sections stretching from Le Mars to Sioux City there could be but little land earned, for there was none there for the Government to turn over under the grant. Therefore the company would not earn lands under the terms of the grant by constructing the line from Le Mars to Sioux City, because there were no lands there to be earned. Therefore the company stopped at Le Mars. There was a part of the line from Le Mars to Sioux City on which there was no considerable portion of public land at all; and a contest is still being made between this and another company as to the overlapping lands within the grant.

But it was easier to make a running arrangement with another railroad company from Le Mars to Sioux City and save the construction of that part of the line on which they would receive no land and secure to themselves a through connection between Saint Paul, Minn., and Sioux City, Iowa; but in doing that act they violated the very spirit of the law by which Congress conferred upon the State of Iowa and this railroad company the land grant mentioned in the act of May 12, 1864, for as a part of that arrangement, as I am informed and have reason to believe and it is so understood by all the people between those two points, this company which was to have built a continuous line to Sioux City stipulated that between those two points it would conduct no local business whatever.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is denied.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not care whether they deny it or not, the practice of the company is to that effect, as the people along that line fully realize in their local business. Therefore the company in no respect is entitled to the lands between these points.

Now it is proposed to amend the grant of 1864 and confer upon this railroad company that has failed to observe the terms of the grant and to comply with its contract a complete grant of land which it could not have received under the act of 1864. The original act provides that this company shall receive—

> Every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said roads; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads are definitely located, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest the tiers of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections, designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or pre-emption has attached as aforesaid, which lands thus indicated by odd numbers and sections, by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be held by the State of Iowa for the uses and purposes aforesaid.

That is for the construction of that line of road from Sioux City to the southern boundary of the State of Minnesota. It has not been done; it is not proposed that it shall be done. An agreement has been made that it shall not be done. Even under the terms of this grant, if the road had been constructed to Sioux City instead of stopping at Le Mars, there would still have been a shortage of this grant because of the grant to another company, and the lands within the overlapping limits of those grants would have been divided between them, thus preventing the Saint Paul and Sioux City road from getting full one hundred sections of land upon each section of 10 miles of road that it may have constructed.

Now in order to cure that defect and in the face of the failure of the company to construct its line as required by law, it is proposed to amend this bill as follows:

> And said company shall be deemed to have earned and be entitled to receive one hundred sections of land for each 10 miles, and ratably for fractions thereof, for each continuous portion of its road constructed in the time required by law; the facts of such construction and the quantities and description of land so earned to be ascertained under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

So it is proposed by this amendment, notwithstanding under the terms of the original grant it were impossible for this company to have full one hundred sections of land to each section of 10 miles, it is now proposed to extend by this amendment the operation of the act of 1864 and confer upon this railroad company, in default of the construction of its line a full hundred sections of land for each 10-mile section and part of section of road constructed by it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Iowa will permit me to make a statement?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The intention of the amendment was not to enlarge the operation of the original act in any respect except so as to avoid the mere technicality of preventing a certificate for the 6.13 miles which overlap the 5.10-miles section, and the amendment can be modified in any way to suit the Senator to express that view. There was no purpose of the kind he suggests.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Unfortunately the language of the proposed amendment is that the "company shall be deemed to have earned and be entitled to receive one hundred sections of land for each 10 miles, and ratably for fractions thereof." That is the language of the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. Insert then "in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress under which the lands were granted." It is only upon the statement of the Senator from Iowa that they would not be able to receive a sufficient quantity of land for the road constructed, that there can be any defect in the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, Mr. President, here is a map showing the limits of the grant between this and another company, and showing conclusively that this company can not receive full one hundred sections of land under the grant of 1864, because it would only receive in the overlapping limits one-half of the lands therein embraced.

It is said then that this amendment is intended only to cover the fractional section of 6 miles constructed by the company to reach Le Mars. In order to do that the company deviated from its line of definite location. If it had not gone into Le Mars with its line, as this map shows, it would have been some 3 or 4 miles west of that point in a direct line for Sioux City, and it had run, established, definitely located, and filed in the Department the line from the southern boundary of the State of Minnesota to Sioux City, Iowa; but when it was found that by this convenient arrangement with another railroad company it could depart from its definitely located line, establish another line to reach Le Mars, and there, by a running arrangement with another railroad, carry its traffic into Sioux City if it was thought best to take that with it, the company took all the risk involved. Take the line as definitely located by this company. This is the line here. [Indicating on the map.] Here is the constructed line. [Indicating.] There is a deviation from the definitely located line on which the grant must be adjusted, and the line of construction is an average of more than 6 miles on that entire portion of the line.

So, then, the company not only has failed to construct its line as it contracted to construct it from Sioux City to the southern line of Minnesota, but it has failed also to construct its line on the one of definite location and in accordance with which the grant must be adjusted. Therefore, sir, this amendment proposes a new and independent grant to a company that has failed to perform the conditions imposed on it by the terms of the original granting act.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this further. It is a new grant if this amendment goes in; it is a new grant to a company that has failed to observe the conditions of its contract; it is a new grant to a company that commenced its construction for its own convenience at the point where it could get land and omitted to construct over that part of its line that would not secure to it its full proportion of the grant mentioned in the act of 1864.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is it not proper now to take up the matter that the Senate passed by informally?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will take but a very short time. I simply wish to make one suggestion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; but 2 o'clock is the hour for the regular order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall take but a few minutes. I should not have made any further remarks if I did not feel that the tone of the remarks and the remarks themselves made by the Senator from Iowa who has just taken his seat were not entirely fair. I do not think the Senator has presented this matter in a fair aspect to the Senate.

This railroad company constructed their road from the northern Iowa line down southwest because by doing so every mile of road they constructed was the continuation of an uninterrupted line from Saint Paul, giving direct communication with every mile of road extended with Lake Superior, so that the farmers of that country when the road was continued in process of its construction received the benefit of it, and if they had commenced from the other end there would have been no connection and no benefit until the entire line was constructed.

Then in regard to this amendment there was no intention by the friends of the amendment to enlarge the grant. It was merely to provide that the technicality which has prevented the State of Iowa from certifying to this company the lands for 6¼ miles of the road constructed because the act required 10 miles to be constructed before the certificate could be issued, should be overlooked.

The State of Iowa has been ready to do that and this is to have it done.

Now, the Senator says it is a new grant. Why, sir, it is no more a new grant than would be the change of a contract. If the Senator from Iowa were to employ me to do six months' labor for him and I should labor five months for him, and, by some sufficient cause, be prevented from performing the other month's labor, then he could say I should not be entitled to remuneration for any part of the labor. I do not believe that is fair. Because they did not construct 10 miles they are not to have lands for the 6¼ miles which they have constructed! That is the position.

All I ask is that the lands be granted for the actual road built and which is now under construction, part of the great system of railways there; and the idea that this great road has made an arrangement of the kind referred to by the Senator from Iowa by which no traffic can be carried upon the road between Le Mars and Sioux City seems of itself to be sufficient—the mere statement of it seems to be sufficient to refute it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Senator from Minnesota misunderstood my remark.

Mr. McMILLAN. I must have done so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I said they had made a running arrangement under which they agreed not to do local business between those two points, not that they shall not conduct their through traffic, but that so far as local business between Le Mars and Sioux City is concerned they will not engage in it.

Mr. McMILLAN. This whole system of roads is under the control of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company. Such a portion of this road as this would not be controlled in that way, and so far as the arrangement between the Sioux City and Saint Paul road is concerned that is denied entirely, and I am assured that that was not so. Whatever running arrangement was made, if any, I am not aware of, but no such arrangement as is referred to by the Senator from Iowa was made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The matter of the control of railroad companies in such cases is one that is exciting a great deal of interest in this country, and that is the reason why the people are endeavoring to get the Congress of the United States to pass some law that shall regulate commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. That can be done.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes, that can be done, and here is one of the very causes for the demand, and it is proposed to reward them by giving them a land grant for that breach of trust.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it is confessed that this land can not be got by the railroad company unless there is legislation to give it these lands directly or which will provide some way whereby it can get them through the machinery of the courts or of the Land Department. The committee believed that the Senate was not willing now to make a new land grant, and they therefore reported a bill which leaves this case exactly where they find it so far as the rights of the respective parties are concerned, and sends these parties to the courts to ascertain what those rights are.

The proposition of the Senator from Minnesota is that Congress shall make a new grant, because if no grant is needed it must be because the railroad company have already earned the lands under the existing law, and that law we invoke the power of the courts to declare. Therefore this proposition, boiled down, is simply that Congress shall now, in this year 1886, make a new land grant, and that not for the purpose of securing the completion of a new railroad but for the purpose of repairing the mistakes which a railroad company endowed with lands in 1864 has made, and a railroad company that did not carry out the purpose of Congress in making the grant, but instead of that imposed upon the people living along the line of that grant the obligation to resort to another railroad company because this railroad company denied the people of that section of country the facilities which Congress intended they should have.

If the Committee on Public Lands had felt disposed to inquire closely and to bring the action of this railroad company to the test, which some think it should have been brought to, a bill of much more sweeping character would have been brought in, because, as I said yesterday, I believe these parties have forfeited every single acre of their land. But the committee said: "This has been so far settled that the patents have been issued to this company, and we will not interfere with them;" and we went even further and said: "As to the lands which you did not earn in strict compliance with the law, we will send that question to the courts in order that it may be determined whether you have anything on the merits, and if you have anything on the merits, that you shall have."

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota, representing this railroad company, is here not only to ask that we shall make this new grant, but he admits that something has to be done before the railroad company whom he represents here can have anything at all. Does he think he is going to get affirmative legislation? Is it not more likely that if they shall prevent the passage of a bill so wise, so just, so equitable as this, and shall operate longer to prevent any legislation whereby this question can be settled, the time will come when that very course of obstruction of theirs will return to destroy that which this bill permits them to keep? I think that the railroad company itself ought to be here asking that a measure of this kind should become a law, rather than by postponing, by obstructing, the passage of a measure of this kind lay up wrath against the day of wrath.

I do not believe for one single instant that the Senate is going to engage at this date in giving new grants of land to railroad companies, wherever located, on any pretext whatever. No company that is just, no combination of persons could ever ask more than this bill gives—simply the privilege of going into court and asserting their right for what they claim they have done. They knew what they were doing. They knew when they commenced to build their railroad from the southern line of Minnesota that a road had already been completed between Le Mars and Sioux City, and they built to that intersection with a full knowledge of the fact. I never before heard of a railroad company that wanted to plead the baby act. I never before heard of one willing to say it had made a mistake in the law and wanted the law-making power to come in and give them something on account of that mistake. The railroad companies bring to their employ sooner or later the men most learned in the law; they know what the law's delays are; they know what the law is; and when these parties built their railroad to Le Mars, thereby preventing themselves from completing this section of 10 miles, they did it with a perfect knowledge of the legal consequences to flow from that act; and I do not want them, as I have said, to be here pleading the baby act and asking us now to relieve them from the legal consequences of that which they did with their eyes open and under legal advice. If they have any rights, the courts are the place to settle them, and it is to the courts that we propose to remit them.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, in summing up the case on the part of the Committee on Public Lands, it seems to me the chairman has evinced some feeling here which might have been dispensed with.

It would have been well, I think, if the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands had embraced in his report all the facts upon which he intended to rely here. What this company have done, which shows that they are pleading the baby act, I am at a loss to discover. So far as I am concerned here, I only presented this amendment because I believe it would be unjust upon the part of the United States to grant public lands at one time for the purpose of building a road, and when the grantees had complied with the act in the construction of the road to rely upon a technicality to refuse to give them the grant. As I said, the only reason why this road can not receive the lands granted by the original act is because the company constructed 6¾ miles of the road instead of 10, and they did not construct the remaining 3¼ miles because they believed it would be of no public benefit, and if they had constructed those additional 3¼ miles of road, while it would have been a technical compliance with the law it would have been a violation of good faith to the Government and to the people, because if they should thereby have gone with 3¼ miles of this road beyond Le Mars they could have perhaps destroyed that town, they could have interfered with the convenience of the people of the town, they could have built just outside of the town a mile and a half perhaps, to the destruction of the community there and their interests. But they followed the interests of the public, and running the risk of losing all the lands they considered the public interests and complied with them. Now they ask merely to have these lands and that the Government shall not rely upon a technicality by which to defeat the grant.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senator takes his seat I will ask him if he believes by legislation the railroad company is entitled to any land for that fractional section of road it built.

Mr. McMILLAN. The original grant prescribed the number of sections for each mile of road that should be granted to the State of Iowa for this line of railroad. In a subsequent section in the grant to the State the law prescribed that the State should certify to the company the lands on the completion of each 10 miles of the road. Now, there may be a technicality there that would prevent the State from certifying the title although the company had earned the land by the construction of the road. Suppose they had built 9 miles of this road and the other mile had not been constructed for a sufficient reason, then because only 9 miles were constructed the Senate of the United States would stand upon a technicality and say, "We will have the pound of flesh." That is what the Senator from Kansas has insisted upon here in his report and remarks. I only ask that the Senate shall decide this matter fairly, do justice about it, and if it is not fair deny the application.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the State of Iowa under the terms of the grant of 1864 could have received from the United States land on a fractional section in order that it might thereafter confer such land upon the railroad company? The act itself provides that—

When the governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of 10 consecutive miles of either of said roads is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, then the Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the State patents for 100 sections of land for the benefit of the road having completed the 10 consecutive miles as aforesaid.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The original grant in the other section is of the prescribed number of sections for each mile of the road.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the certificate must be for 10 consecutive constructed miles of road.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia rise to call up his resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Not to interrupt the roll-call. I simply want to call up the resolution after the roll is called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. Unless he comes in before the roll-call is concluded I shall withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], but as I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay," I will vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Brown,	Frye,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Conger,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Sawyer.
Dolph,	McMillan,	Platt,

Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Payne,	Walthall.
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 2d instant, approved and signed the act (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford, and on this day the act (S. 296) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Hatfield, deceased.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I call up the resolution which was laid over subject to my call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia calls up the unfinished business of the morning hour, which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. LOGAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of James B. Eads be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that they be instructed to thoroughly investigate the charge contained therein.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that at the close of the morning business to-morrow I shall again move the consideration of the bill which has been under consideration this morning.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I find in the RECORD of this morning a letter to "Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, United States Senate," and signed by "James B. Eads," which is the foundation underlying the whole investigation called for in the pending resolution. I would like to know, in the first place, how the Senator from Illinois could have gotten this letter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There was no resolution, no motion relating to it, preceding it.

Mr. LOGAN. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I had nothing to do with its going into the RECORD. I did not ask that it go into the RECORD.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Still it is here. How was it got in under any proper rule of the Senate? I do not mean to say that the Senator got it in there in any offensive sense, but I say that it is in the RECORD without any motion or resolution preceding it.

Now, sir, I could load down the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with personal letters to me, and many of them that would be unpleasant reading to Senators on this floor, and especially could I do that in a Presidential campaign, and bring them here week after week and insert them here and ask for a Senatorial investigation by a committee.

Who, sir, is Eads? Many people say he is a great engineer, and many others say that he is a great American humbug. He is to come here and have filed in the RECORD a letter that is to arraign me before a committee to answer charges made! Sir, when you put them in this RECORD they are not Eads's charges but they are the charges of the Senator who files them here. That is the way I look at this. Eads can not charge me with falsehood and put it on the RECORD of this Congress, but a Senator can take Eads's letter and make it a part of his own charge against me.

Here it is said, after taking out a part of my own language and sending me to the country on the record as made up on what he chooses to state, that what I presented was "utterly untrue." I mean to say to-day that that is the allegation of the Senator from Illinois as it appears here, and I mean to answer it as such. Sir, I have stood from the start of this question, from the beginning of this matter, in the committee-room, and I mean to continue the contest, against what I believe to be a fraudulent endeavor to make the United States the indorser of the bonds of a bankrupt government.

Mr. LOGAN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am perfectly astounded at the Senator's statement that I have charged him with anything. I have made no charge against the Senator.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. You presented the letter.

Mr. LOGAN. I did. That does not make any charge by me. I presented a letter of a respectable man in the United States by way of petition asking that a charge against him be investigated. He was charged with having persons on this floor to blacken the reputation of Senators. He asked that that letter be presented to the Senate, and in that he said:

I therefore ask that the Senate cause the said statement of the Senator from Virginia to be thoroughly investigated.

What could I do but present it? I presented it as a mere petition.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is a personal letter to you.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir. I did it as I will do it for any respectable citizen in the United States. When he asks me to present his petition to the Senate of the United States I will do so; but I meant nothing personal to the Senator.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And I will resent such an imputation as long as I live, come wheresoever it may. It had no right here. It is a personal letter to "Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN," and it had no more right on this RECORD than any personal letter that I may receive.

Now, sir, I repeat, though I am not so great a soldier as the Senator from Illinois, that by slow approaches and parallels I will yet discover and uncover to the people of the United States this conspiracy to make our tax-payers the indorsers of, not Eads, but Eads's ship-canal or railway company. I started in for that, and when you put a coal on a terrapin's back, being slow to move, you make him travel the faster.

I offended nobody; I offended no Senator in any way. When we speak of Eads we speak of him merely as the representative of a ship-railway; that is all. We did not charge him with doing anything; I did not, surely. I have not heard of anybody doing it. We all know that ex-Secretary of the Treasury Windom is the president of that great conception. We all know, who have looked into it, who are the officers of it. Here it is called the Eads ship-railway; and when I spoke of Eads I did not think he was so grand, so big a man as he now appears to be. I therefore mean to say now that I can stand by all that they may hurl against me in this matter. The report that came from the Sergeant-at-Arms this morning is all the vindication I wanted, all that I would want to go to my home against the vile aspersions of the last few weeks. The man who married his second wife while his first lived, and the miserable caricature of a man who can defend his mother in a divorce suit and then betray her, can not hurt me among the people of Virginia, and especially in the community in which I live.

I am bound to answer this now once and for all, and I do dare to say in the Senate that this is a scheme to make the United States Government the indorser of bonds of a bankrupt government; and if we are to do that, if a ship-railway is to benefit this Government and it has ultimately to pay for it, we had better pay for it at the beginning and own it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment after the Senator from Virginia, as I introduced this letter?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Missouri for yielding to me. I do not rise to reply to the speech of the Senator from Virginia at all. I merely rise to state facts. The Senator from Virginia had on the floor of the Senate made a charge—at least the RECORD showed it—and Mr. Eads copied it in these words:

That while Eads was not on this floor, he has three henchmen here, two of them representing Republican journals and one a Democratic journal, coming to get information, to libel Senators on this floor whenever they can get their type and presses to work, &c.

This charge was made. I have not seen Mr. Eads for, I think, several weeks, certainly not for many days; I understand that he is sick at his home in New York; but he sent me this letter and asked me to present it to the Senate, and in it requested that this charge against him be investigated. If there was anything wrong in that I do not understand it. That is what I have done.

Mr. Eads is certainly considered a respectable gentleman in this country. There was a measure that he was connected with before Congress, and he was charged with doing certain things which were improper in his own interest and in the interest of his company. That reflected upon him; and he copied the charge and wrote me this letter, and he asked that it be presented and that the matter be investigated. I presented it for Mr. Eads, as I would present such a paper for any gentleman in the country anywhere who had been assailed, and in his letter he asked that this matter be investigated.

I have not asked anything, except that Mr. Eads's letter be presented and referred to a committee, and that the matter be investigated as he requested. It is only carrying out his request. I have nothing to say as to the charge. I know nothing about it. I hope the letter will be referred to the committee, and that they will examine into it, as Mr. Eads desires they shall do, for the purpose of either vindicating him or of showing that he is guilty of these improprieties that are charged against him.

Now, sir, I do not see why any Senator should take exception to that. I can not understand why any one should take exception to that. It is certainly a right that free citizens of a republic like this have when they are charged with offenses where they can not defend themselves that they should have an investigation to see whether or not they are true. That is all I have done; and I shall ask when the Senator from Missouri shall get through, unless some other Senator wishes to say something, that the resolution be referred to the committee with this letter and that they may have charge of it. That is all I have to do with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, Capt. James B. Eads was for many years a distinguished citizen of the great State of Missouri, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. His name and his character and his genius need no defense, no justification against the assaults made upon him by the distinguished Senator from Virginia. He is known in the United States, and he is known throughout the world; and when all of us shall have passed to that "undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns," when "the places on earth that know us now shall know us no more forever," and we shall have been forgotten, including the distinguished Senator from Virginia, then the genius and the character and the fame and the plans and the works conceived in the brain and executed by the hand of James B. Eads will stand living monuments, and will go down through all time to come.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator has made the speech I should have expected, for I should have supposed an exhorter at a camp-meeting would have said something about the bourn from which no traveler returns. I made no assault upon Captain Eads, and the Senator from Missouri ought to have known it. If he wants to pile injustice upon injustice, let him repeat it again. Possibly he has said the worst that he could of Captain Eads by stating to the Senate that he was from Missouri.

Sir, I said nothing about Captain Eads. I was speaking of a project that is before this country. I was speaking of the effort to make this country the indorser of the negotiable paper of a bankrupt government. Captain Eads is in it, and when I speak of him I speak only of him in that sense in which he is mentioned in the newspapers and everywhere.

I make these remarks so that Captain Eads himself will understand that I do not mean to detract from him, or to reflect upon him in any way. I speak of him because all that we have to consider hereafter is named for him and the lobby that comes here, though he may not know it—and yet his letter does not deny it—maybe the lobby of the officers, the directors, the holders of the stock of the company, and Eads may not know of it.

I make no attack upon him, but I do mean to say that on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol, from information I have gathered there and from information I have ascertained here, known here, there are lobbyists for a scheme to make this Government throw away millions of money without knowing where it is to go. I say it has been done, not as was represented that I said a few days ago by the gentlemen of the press, for we have many gentlemen on this floor representing the press who have a right to come here, but it has been done by those who are paid lobbyists, first to persuade, next to abuse, and next to vilify and blackguard. I deny that I have said anything against Captain Eads.

The Senator from Missouri has said more against him in his remarks than I have in mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution of the Senator from Illinois to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. I fail to see why the Committee on Rules should be burdened with an investigation of that kind. I do not see that it has anything to do with the subject-matter. The Committee on Commerce has the subject of Mr. Eads's ship-railway canal before it. I am not aware that the Committee on Rules has the slightest connection with this matter in any direction whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the resolution be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois made a motion that the pending resolution be referred, as the Chair understood.

Mr. INGALLS. What is to be referred? Let us have it read.

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion to refer the resolution, or that the resolution itself be agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to refer the resolution. The Senator from Illinois made the motion. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of James B. Eads be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that they be instructed to thoroughly investigate the charge contained therein.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Illinois to change his motion so that the communication may be referred to the Committee on Commerce, the only committee of this body that has any jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The Committee on Rules certainly has no earthly connection with or jurisdiction over the subject, and there is no propriety in referring the communication to that committee.

Mr. LOGAN. My first motion yesterday was to refer it to the Committee on Commerce. Somebody objected, and I said I did not care to what committee it went, nor do I care. I am perfectly willing to amend the motion by referring it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not make that motion.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the Senator from Illinois moved a resolution, which is that the letter read by him be referred to the Committee on Rules, and that they be instructed so and so. I did not understand that he made a motion to refer the resolution. The RECORD certainly contains no statement of any motion to refer. When was the motion made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois made that motion within a few minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. If I may be permitted, I will change the motion to a motion to put the resolution on its passage, and will change the direction from the Committee on Rules to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator modifies his resolution so as to make it a direction to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out so much of the resolution as requires an investigation. It does not seem to me that there has been anything yet developed to authorize the Senate to specially instruct a committee to enter upon an investigation. I therefore move to strike it out, leaving the matter to go to the committee, and let the committee determine the question for itself in the progress of whatever work it may have before it which is germane to this general subject, which has been so much spoken about, and report to the Senate if necessary.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Illinois will accept that modification.

Mr. LOGAN. I will accept it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the letter of James B. Eads be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Illinois is that the resolution itself be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before that motion is put, I wish to say again that I do not intend to appear before any committee. What remarks I shall have to make will be made in the Senate. Here from the time that you go into executive session you assail men everywhere all over the country, and you refuse to allow them a chance to be heard. Everything that I say shall be with open doors. I do not believe in the Senate becoming more English than the House of Lords itself. I shall go before no committee. Let Mr. Eads's representative who has put this letter on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD take care of him on this floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, I have certainly dealt kindly with the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Certainly you have, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. But when he talks about my being a representative of Mr. Eads or anybody else, he states that which is absolutely untrue.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I said it in the sense that you represent him to the extent of putting this letter of his on the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah!

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And you can not deny that.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Virginia will not get into any controversy with me.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir, I hope not.

Mr. LOGAN. Nor will any ill blood be aroused by his statement. To the extent of having presented the letter I am responsible; but when he states that I am a representative of anybody except a general representative in the Senate of the people at large, as I said he states that which is not correct, sir.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Now, General LOGAN, allow me to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will please come to order. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the letter and resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce, that they may examine into the matter; and if they deem proper to report to the Senate for the purpose of an inquiry, that they may do so.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What I mean by saying that the Senator from Illinois is a representative is, that when I introduce a bill or resolution into the Senate for a constituent or friend I consider that I am representing him, and I never consider that I do otherwise unless I put the words "by request" on the back of the paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for one moment, that the resolution may be referred to the committee, so that all wrangling at least may be avoided.

Mr. HARRIS. The adoption of the resolution refers it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the matter will not be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want any discussion now, but let it be referred at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia objects. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] has the floor on the unfinished business, but the Chair will ask him to yield that the Chair may lay before the Senate certain messages from the President of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

JOHN HOLLINS M'BLAIR—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have carefully considered Senate bill No. 193, entitled "An act for the relief of John Hollins McBlair," and hereby return the same without approval to the Senate, where it originated, with my objections to the same.

The object of this bill is to suspend the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army by promotion so far as they affect John Hollins McBlair, and to authorize the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said McBlair a first lieutenant in the Army and to place him upon the retired-list as of the date of April 8, 1864, with the pay of his rank from April 30, 1884.

The beneficiary named in this bill was appointed a first lieutenant in the Army from civil life in June, 1861, with rank from May 14, 1861.

It appears from his own testimony, afterward taken before a retiring board, that at the time he was commissioned he was but seventeen years of age.

In October, 1861, he was in the field for five days with his regiment, within which time he participated in no battle, skirmish, or engagement of any kind.

After five days spent in marching and camping he was taken sick, and after remaining in camp six or seven weeks, his illness still continuing, he was granted sick leave and came to Washington.

In June, 1862, he was put on duty in the Commissary Department at Washington and remained there until August, 1863, when he was summoned before a retiring board convened for the purpose of retiring disabled officers.

From testimony before this board it appears that the illness which caused him to leave his regiment was one not uncommon in the Army, and yielded to treatment, so that in April or May, 1862, he was completely cured.

About this time, however, he was attacked with convulsions, which were pronounced by the physicians examined before the board to be a form of epilepsy, and for this cause he was found to be incapacitated for active service.

The medical testimony, while it suggests various causes for this epileptic condition, negatives entirely any claim that these attacks were at all related to the illness which obliged this officer to abandon service with his regiment. He testified himself that he had been told he had one or two convulsions in childhood, but there is no direct testimony that he was subject to epileptic attack before he entered the Army.

The retiring board determined upon the proof that this incapacity did not result from any incident of military service, and therefore Lieutenant McBlair was, in October, 1863, retired wholly from the service with one year's pay and allowances, which is the usual action in such cases, and which was approved by the President.

But in April, 1864, the President, in a review of the case, made an order that instead of this officer being wholly retired he should be placed upon the retired-list as of the date when the action of the retiring board was originally approved.

For about twenty years, and up to April 30, 1884, he remained upon the retired-list and received the pay to which this position entitled him. Quite recently, in consequence of a claim of additional pay which he made upon the Government, his status was examined by the Court of Claims, which decided that the action of the President in April, 1864, by which he sought to change the original disposition of the case upon the findings of the retiring board, was nugatory, and that ever since October, 1863, this officer had not been connected with the Army and had been receiving from the Government money to which he was not entitled.

If the bill herewith returned becomes a law it makes valid all payments made, and if its purpose is carried out causes such payments to be resumed.

The finding of the retiring board seems so satisfactory, and the merits of this case so slight in the light of the large sum already paid to the applicant, while the claims of thousands of wounded and disabled soldiers wait for justice at the hands of the Government, that I am constrained to interpose an objection to a measure which proposes to suspend general and wholesome laws for the purpose of granting what appears to me to be an undeserved gratuity.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 10, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. The message should be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is usual to let such a message lie on the table, and to take it up for a vote on the bill according to the Constitution. However, a motion to refer is in order at any time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it had better be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress the report of the National Board of Health for the year 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 10, 1886.

OMAHA INDIANS IN NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 5th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill, prepared in the office of Indian Affairs, "for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska."

The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 10, 1886.

RICHARD MURRAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Richard Murray, band Seventh United States Infantry, praying to be relieved of his political disabilities; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RESIGNATION OF SENATE CHAPLAIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letter; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 10, 1886.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore of the Senate:

I hereby present my resignation as Chaplain of the United States Senate, the same to take effect Monday, March 15, 1886. My appointment as pastor of a church in another city necessitates this severing of relations which have been pleasant to me, and which I hope have not been altogether profitless to the Senate. Thanking you and all the members of the Senate for the uniform courtesy and kindness which have been extended to me during the period of my chaplaincy,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ELIAS DEWITT HUNTLEY.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1622) to prohibit any officer, agent, or servant of the Government of the United States of America to hire or contract out the labor of prisoners incarcerated for violating the laws of the Government of the United States of America was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (H. R. 5874) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 18) for the further distribution of the Report of the Public Land Commission was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will now be proceeded with.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have expressed my views fully upon the subject of this debate in the report made from the Judiciary Committee by the minority, and the main object I have in now addressing the Senate in reply to the Senator from Vermont is to prevent, if it is in my power to do so—which I admit is a difficult undertaking—the Senator from changing the character of the question between the Senate and the President. The real character of that controversy can not be misunderstood or misrepresented as it arises on facts apparent upon the record and reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee. When the Senator from Vermont is at the wheel he steers by his own chart. He never runs on straight lines; he never consults other sailors, and he loses his temper when there is any question of the skill of his seamanship; and when the officer of the ship undertakes to select a crew to man it without his advice and consent, he instantly heads a mutiny. At the risk of incurring the displeasure of my honorable and distinguished friend I shall call a reckoning, so that we may understand where we are and whither we are drifting.

What are the facts by which it is the duty of all of us to be guided? They are few and simple. On the 17th of July, 1885, George M. Duskin, being district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, was suspended by the President, and on the same day John D. Burnett was designated to discharge the duties of that office. On the 14th of December, 1885, the Senate being in session, John D. Burnett was nominated to the Senate to get its advice and consent to his appointment. That nomination was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and it remained there for over a month. In the mean time, on the 20th of December, 1885, the term of office of George M. Duskin expired. On the 25th of January, 1886, one month after the term of George M. Duskin had expired, and when he was no longer an incumbent of that office, the following resolution was sent by the Senate to the Attorney-General:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers—

All documents and papers—that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

To that resolution the Attorney-General made the following answer:

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution and still remaining in the custody of this Department having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

For what purpose was that information sought of the Attorney-General by the Senate? The majority of the Judiciary Committee state distinctly the purpose for which those papers were sought in the following language:

It will also be observed that the President has not undertaken to remove the incumbent of the office, but has only, in expressed and stated pursuance of the statutes on the subject, suspended that officer, and that the same statutes expressly provide that such officer shall not be removed without the advice and consent of the Senate and that, if that advice and consent be not given, the incumbent would (unless his regular term of office should have previously expired) at the close of this session of the Senate, be restored to the lawful right to exercise its duties. The Senate then, by this nomination, is asked to advise and consent to the removal of the incumbent and to the appointment of the candidate proposed for his place. In exercising its duty in respect of these questions it is plain that the conduct and management of the incumbent is a matter absolutely essential to be known to the Senate in order that it may determine whether it can rightly advise his removal or rightly leave him to resume the functions of his office at the end of its session, as well as whether the candidate proposed has, in the exercise of the office under his designation, so conducted himself as to show that he is competent and faithful.

Is it not desirable and necessary to the proper performance of its duties, and in every aspect of the public interest, that the simple facts in regard to what the conduct of these officials, as well as in regard to what the conduct of the persons designated to perform their duties has been, should be made known to the Senate? Have these suspended officials, or any considerable number of them, been guilty of misconduct in office, or of any personal conduct making them unworthy to be longer trusted with the performance of duties imposed upon them by law? If they have, it would seem to be clear that every consideration of public interest and of public duty would require that the facts should be made known, in order that the Senate may understandingly and promptly advise their removal.

It is useless for me to read other passages in the majority report making the same statement, that the use the Senate intended to make of the documents and papers sought from the office of the Attorney-General was to enable the Senate to exercise the power of revising the act of the President in the removal of Duskin. What was the character of the information sought by the Senate from the office of the Attorney-General? The resolution speaks for itself upon that subject.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers.

Not public documents; not official documents; not public papers; not official papers; but private documents and private papers relating exclusively to the official act of the President in the suspension of Duskin as district attorney. The demand made of the Attorney-General in that resolution was that the private documents and private papers on file relating exclusively to the act of the suspension of Duskin were to be transmitted to the Senate for its use in determining whether the President properly suspended the incumbent. This inquiry was to be made by the Senate with the knowledge of the fact reported in the Official Register in the possession of the Judiciary Committee that more than four weeks before that resolution was reported from the Judiciary Committee and offered to the Senate the term of Duskin had expired.

Then what possible use could be made of the information sought in this case? It was a pure fiction. What could be the use to be made by the Senate of these private documents and private papers if furnished to it by the Attorney-General? What possible practical use could be made of them? The report of the majority is that it was to enable the Senate to discharge a great duty imposed upon it, of making an inquiry as to the propriety of an official act by the President expressly conferred upon him by law, to be exercised within his discretion, during the recess of the Senate. If they had decided that the removal was improper, that it was unwise, what would have been the effect of the decision? Could it have restored Duskin? Was he still an officer suspended? Was he still an officer waiting for the adjournment of the Senate, so that in case no person designated in his place was confirmed, he was to be restored to the duties of the office? Not so; and we are here to-day engaged in an inquiry about a matter from which there can be no possible practical result. It is a moot question merely, and the Senate is thrown into a moot-court in discussing a purely abstract proposition.

How is that act of the Attorney-General refusing, five weeks after the expiration of the term of Duskin, to send those private papers and private documents relating solely to the suspension of Duskin characterized by the resolution to which the solemn sanction of the Senate is asked?

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

The act of the Attorney-General refusing to send private documents and private papers relating to the suspension of a district attorney five weeks after the expiration of his term of office, in obedience to the express orders of the President, is characterized as a violation of official duty, and that violation is denounced as being subversive of the principles of the Government and of good administration. The act is so characterized as to make it a sufficient ground for his instant impeachment.

Here is a resolution calling on the Attorney-General to disregard the positive order of the President not to transmit papers that he states in his message he considered to belong to him exclusively as his private papers, and that act of refusal of the Attorney-General on the order of the President is characterized as an act subversive of the principles of the Government and of good administration.

What sort of relation would obedience to the resolution by the Attorney-General, in defiance of the order of the President, have created between the President and his Cabinet? What is the character of that relation? I will allow the Senator from Vermont himself to define it. In the debate on the passage of the tenure-of-office act the Senator from Vermont used the following language, found in the Congressional Globe, 1869, first session Forty-first Congress, page 179:

But it did seem to the committee, after a great deal of consultation and reflection, that it was right and just that the Chief Executive of the nation in selecting these named secretaries, who by law and by the practice of the country and officers analogous to whom by the practice of all other countries are the confidential advisers of the Executive respecting the administration of all his Departments, should be persons who were personally agreeable to him, in whom he could place entire confidence and reliance, and that whenever it should seem to him that the state of relations between him and any of them had become so as to render this relation of confidence and trust and personal esteem inharmonious, he should in such case be allowed to dispense with the services of that officer in vacation, and have some other person to act in his stead.

Here the Senate is asked to pass a resolution condemning the Attorney-General for obeying the President, whose adviser he was, who stood in that relation of confidence and trust to him stated by the Senator from Vermont. The Attorney-General is asked by this resolution of the Senate to disregard the positive order of the President and thereby make himself liable to instant dismissal from the Cabinet. On the terms of that relation stated by the Senator from Vermont himself President Cleveland could not with self-respect have held that Attorney-General in his Cabinet a single moment after obeying the resolution of the Senate. Is that the way for one co-ordinate department to treat another? Is there to be a request from this great law-making power upon the Chief Magistrate of the country or his Attorney-General that would result in breaking up their relations of confidence and trust and in making the Attorney-General liable to instant dismissal from the Cabinet?

Now, what does the President say upon the action that the Senate asked of his Attorney-General in utter disobedience to his positive order and direction? The President says in his message to this body:

Upon this resolution and the answer thereto the issue is thus stated by the Committee on the Judiciary at the outset of the report:

"The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves."

I do not suppose that "the public offices of the United States" are regulated or controlled in their relations to either House of Congress by the fact that they were "created by laws enacted by themselves." It must be that these instrumentalities were created for the benefit of the people and to answer the general purposes of government under the Constitution and the laws, and that they are unencumbered by any lien in favor of either branch of Congress growing out of their construction and unembarrassed by any obligation to the Senate as the price of their creation.

The complaint of the committee, that access to official papers in the public offices is denied the Senate, is met by the statement that at no time has it been the disposition or the intention of the President or any Department of the executive branch of the Government to withhold from the Senate official documents or papers filed in any of the public offices. While it is by no means conceded that the Senate has the right in any case to review the act of the Executive in removing or suspending a public officer upon official documents or otherwise, it is considered that documents and papers of that nature should, because they are official, be freely transmitted to the Senate upon its demand, trusting the use of the same for proper and legitimate purposes to the good faith of that body. And though no such paper or document has been specifically demanded in any of the numerous requests and demands made upon the Departments, yet as often as they were found in the public offices they have been furnished in answer to such applications.

The letter of the Attorney-General in response to the resolution of the Senate in the particular case mentioned in the committee's report was written at my suggestion and by my direction. There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution.

There is the statement by the President of a matter of fact within his personal knowledge, and the Senator from Vermont controverts the truth of that statement, having no foundation whatever for the denial. There is a square issue made in the report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee with the President upon a matter of fact that is within his personal knowledge. The President says further:

There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution. The letter was intended, by its description of the papers and documents remaining in the custody of the Department, to convey the idea that they were not official; and it was assumed that the resolution called for information, papers, and documents of the same character as were required by the requests and demands which preceded it.

Everything that had been written or done on behalf of the Senate from the beginning pointed to all letters and papers of a private and unofficial nature as the objects of search if they were to be found in the Departments, and provided they had been presented to the Executive with a view to their consideration upon the question of suspension from office.

Against the transmission of such papers and documents I have interposed my advice and direction. This has not been done, as is suggested in the committee's report, upon the assumption on my part that the Attorney-General or any other head of a Department "is the servant of the President and is to give or withhold copies of documents in his office according to the will of the Executive and not otherwise," but because I regard the papers and documents withheld and addressed to me or intended for my use and action purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine. I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control. I suppose if I desired to take them into my custody I might do so with entire propriety, and if I saw fit to destroy them no one could complain.

Even the committee in its report appears to concede that there may be with the President, or in the Departments, papers and documents which, on account of their unofficial character, are not subject to the inspection of the Congress. A reference in the report to instances where the House of Representatives ought not to succeed in a call for the production of papers is immediately followed by this statement:

"The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government until now any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions, to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded."

There is a statement in the majority report that the description of papers given to the Senate by the President are not such as those to which the Senate is entitled.

To which of the classes thus recognized do the papers and documents belong that are now the objects of the Senate's quest?

They consist of letters and representations addressed to the Executive or intended for his inspection; they are voluntarily written and presented by private citizens who are not in the least instigated thereto by any official invitation or at all subject to official control. While some of them are entitled to Executive consideration, many of them are so irrelevant, or in the light of other facts so worthless, that they have not been given the least weight in determining the question to which they are supposed to relate.

Are all these, simply because they are preserved, to be considered official documents and subject to the inspection of the Senate? If not, who is to determine which belong to this class? Are the motives and purposes of the Senate, as they are day by day developed, such as would be satisfied with my selection? Am I to submit to theirs at the risk of being charged with making a suspension from office upon evidence which was not even considered?

Are these papers to be regarded official because they have not only been presented but preserved in the public offices?

Their nature and character remain the same whether they are kept in the Executive Mansion or deposited in the Departments. There is no mysterious power of transmutation in departmental custody, nor is there magic in the undefined and sacred solemnity of Department files. If the presence of these papers in the public offices is a stumbling-block in the way of the performance of Senatorial duty, it can be easily removed.

The papers and documents which have been described derive no official character from any constitutional, statutory, or other requirement making them necessary to the performance of the official duty of the Executive.

It will not be denied, I suppose, that the President may suspend a public officer in the entire absence of any papers or documents to aid his official judgment and discretion. And I am quite prepared to avow that the cases are not few in which suspensions from office have depended more upon oral representations made to me by citizens of known good repute, and by members of the House of Representatives and Senators of the United States, than upon any letters and documents presented for my examination. I have not felt justified in suspecting the veracity, integrity, and patriotism of Senators, or ignoring their representations, because they were not in party affiliation with the majority of their associates; and I recall a few suspensions which bear the approval of individual members identified politically with the majority in the Senate.

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension, during the recess of the Senate, of Federal officials.

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

That makes the issue between the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the President, and the Senate is asked to support the report of the Committee on the Judiciary by the adoption of the report and the passage of the first resolution reported. That is the issue to be decided by the Senate.

Are the papers called for from the Attorney-General such as the Senate has the right to have in the discharge of any of its duties? The President states that the papers are private, unofficial, and relate to nothing over which the Senate has jurisdiction. The majority of the Judiciary Committee and its distinguished chairman the Senator from Vermont say that this information, although unofficial and private, does enable the Senate to discharge a duty that it has, a power that it claims, of revising the official act of the President in suspending George M. Duskin as district attorney.

That is the undisputed basis of the claim to these private unofficial papers and documents. It is a claim of the power of the Senate to exercise the same control and revision over the act of suspension or removal which is claimed and exercised and given to the Senate expressly by the Constitution of advising and consenting to appointments. There is no mistake about that being the claim asserted by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, and there is no mistake that the resolution reported condemns the official act of the Attorney-General for the reason that he has withheld, on the order of the President, information that he states was composed of private documents and papers that he said were unofficial and private, and withheld from the Senate on the President's positive order because they are private, because they are unofficial, and relate to no duty that the Constitution or law imposes upon the Senate to discharge.

Is there anything in the history of the Government to support this claim? The distinguished Senator from Vermont has presented a large array of what he calls precedents. I undertake to say, and I challenge denial upon the fullest test, that there is no case in the history of the Government for eighty years where any such documents as those called for in the resolution were ever transmitted to the Senate in executive or public session on the order of the Senate upon an Attorney-General or President. My honorable and distinguished friend paraded, in a manner that indicated he was about to achieve a great triumph over the President, the production of a resolution sent from the Judiciary Committee and signed by Allen G. Thurman, as its chairman, upon the Attorney-General. I indorse all that the Senator so well said about Allen G. Thurman. Yes, Mr. President, Allen G. Thurman is the greatest and the wisest and the purest American statesman now living. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Alabama will please suspend. The Chair will admonish the galleries that the slightest evidence of approval or disapproval is in violation of the rules of the Senate, and if repeated the Chair will order such disorderly persons to be expelled from the galleries. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PUGH. I was surprised that the great Senator from Vermont, speaking from this great law-making department of the Government, should invoke the name and fame and authority of that great statesman to sustain the claim the majority are now making upon the Attorney-General for the documents and papers. What had Senator Thurman said upon the floor of the Senate in relation to this very power of removal? In 1869 in the debate upon the amendatory tenure-of-office act, Senator Thurman used the following language:

Believing that the original interpretation of the Constitution is the correct one; that the power of removal from office is an executive power; that the duty of exercising that power is enjoined upon the President by the provision of the Constitution that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; believing that the assent of the Senate is not a necessary and logical result that the Senate consents to appointments; believing that no such inference follows from the concurrence of the Senate in making appointments; and believing, also, that it is wiser that it should be as our fathers settled it, that the offices will be better filled and the laws more faithfully executed if this power is vested in the President alone, I feel bound to vote for an unqualified repeal of the tenure-of-office act.

After that declaration of his opinions upon the question of the power of removal now in controversy the Senator from Vermont invokes an order signed by Allen G. Thurman as chairman of the Judiciary Committee upon the Attorney-General, which I will read to the Senate:

APRIL 7, 1879.

SIR: Under the direction of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, I have the honor to request that you will communicate to the committee any papers or information in your possession touching the question of the priority—

"Propriety" is the word, not priority. I looked at the original resolution this morning—touching the question of the propriety of the removal of Michael Shaeffer, chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and the appointment of David T. Corbin to that office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. THURMAN, Chairman.

The Hon. ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

Shaeffer was chief-justice of a Territorial court. What does section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, the tenure-of-office act, say?

SEC. 1768. During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the courts of the United States.

In the section conferring the power of suspension upon the President is an express exception of judges of the courts of the United States. Now the question is whether Territorial judges are embraced in that language. The Senator from Vermont knew that that question was now before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. He knew that the great Senator and lawyer from New York [Mr. EVARTS] was a member of that subcommittee with the splendid lawyer the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]; and after two weeks or more consideration they had made no report on that question submitted to them of the power of the President in vacation to suspend a judge of a Territorial court.

The Senator from Vermont knew that the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] had expressed the opinion that Territorial judges were not subject to the power of suspension by the President. That is today an open question before the very committee of which the honorable Senator is chairman, and with a declaration by one of the most distinguished lawyers that ornament the bar of this country declaring it to be his opinion that this power of suspension given to the President in section 1768 did not apply to Territorial judges. Then why was it that Senator Thurman, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, sent that order of inquiry to the Attorney-General? He sent it under section 1767, making them subject to removal, but only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There is the authority for the order of Chairman Thurman on the Attorney-General to send in all information and papers relating to the removal, not suspension. Section 1767 reads:

SEC. 1767. Every person holding any civil office to which he has been or hereafter may be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have become duly qualified to act therein, shall be entitled to hold such office during the term for which he was appointed, unless sooner removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the appointment, with the like advice and consent, of a successor in his place, except as herein otherwise provided.

The power of removal is to be exercised by and with the advice and consent of the Senate under section 1767. It was in obedience to the provisions of that section 1767 that the order was sent by Chairman Thurman to the Attorney-General to give information in reference to a removal that required the advice and consent of the Senate just as in the case of appointment. It was a request, perhaps, instead of a demand; I am not particular about words.

There is not one single precedent entitled to any consideration on account of its being applicable to the issue now before the Senate; there is not one cited in the speech of the Senator nor one cited in the report of the majority.

There have been some Presidents besides Mr. Cleveland who have sent messages to the Senate of like character with that which I have just read.

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1833.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have attentively considered the resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the members of the executive department, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices. The executive is a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government equally with the Senate, and I have yet to learn under what special authority that branch of the Legislature has the right to require of me an account of any communication, either verbal or in writing, made to the heads of the Departments, acting as a Cabinet council. As well might I be required to detail to the Senate the free and private conversations I held with those officers on any subject relating to their duties and my own.

Feeling my responsibility to the American people, I am willing upon all occasions to explain to them the grounds of my conduct; and I am willing upon all proper occasions to give to either branch of the Legislature any information in my possession that can be useful in the execution of the proper duties confided to them. Knowing the constitutional rights of the Senate, I shall be the last man under any circumstances to interfere with them. Knowing those of the Executive, I shall at all times endeavor to maintain them, agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution and my solemn oath to support and defend it. I am constrained, therefore, by a proper sense of my own self-respect and of the rights secured by the Constitution to the executive branch of the Government to decline a compliance with your request.

ANDREW JACKSON.

I wish we had more Jacksons living. Here is another message:

WASHINGTON, January 13, 1835.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received the resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, requesting me to communicate "a copy of any report made by any director or directors of the Bank of the United States appointed by the Government purporting to give information to the Executive of certain notes and bills of exchange, discounted at the Bank of the United States for account and benefit of George Poindexter, a member of the Senate; also the name or names of such director or directors.

In my replies to the resolutions of the Senate of the 11th December, 1833—and of 12th of June, 1834, the former passed in their legislative, and the latter in their executive, capacity I had occasion to state the objections to requests of this nature, and to vindicate, in this respect, the constitutional rights of the executive department. The views then expressed remain unchanged; and as I think them peculiarly applicable to the present occasion, I should feel myself required to decline any reply to the resolution before me were there not reasons to apprehend that persons now in nomination before the Senate might probably, by such a course, be exposed to improper and injurious imputations.

The resolution of the Senate, standing alone, would seem to be adopted with the view—

There is an attempt to examine into the uses intended to be made by the Senate of the information sought of the President—

The resolution of the Senate, standing alone, would seem to be adopted with the view of obtaining information in regard to the transactions which may have been had between a particular member of the Senate and the Bank of the United States. It can, however, scarcely be supposed that such was its object, inasmuch as the Senate have it in their power to obtain any information they may desire on this subject from their own committee, who have been freely allowed, as appears by their published report, to make examinations of the books and proceedings of the bank, peremptorily denied to the Government directors, and not even allowed to the committee of the House of Representatives. It must, therefore, be presumed that the resolution has reference to some other matter; and on referring to the Executive Journal of the Senate, I find therein such proceedings as in my judgment fully to authorize the apprehension stated.

Under these circumstances, and for the purpose of preventing misapprehension and injustice, I think it proper to communicate herewith a copy of the only report made to me by any director or directors of the Bank of the United States appointed by the Government since the report of the 19th August, 1833, which is already in the possession of the Senate. It will be perceived that the paper herewith transmitted contains no information whatever as to the discounting of notes or bills of exchange for the account and benefit of the member of the Senate named in their resolution, nor have I at any time received from the Government directors any report purporting to give any such information.

ANDREW JACKSON.

What is the explanation of the opinion of the Senator from Vermont? Where do you find the foundation of the opinion stated by him in every debate he ever had on this subject, in the report from the Judiciary Committee and in his remarkable speech of yesterday? The foundation of that opinion is that the power of removal is not vested in the President by the Constitution either expressly or by implication; but that the power of removal is a legislative power, vested alone in Congress, and that the President has no power over removals or suspensions except such as he derives from and through Congress. That was the precise issue made in the First Congress under the Constitution in 1789; that was the precise issue made by Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun in the contest with Andrew Jackson in 1835.

If the power of removal is a creature of the law and there is no power to make the law except the two Houses of Congress, then you find the predicate for the statement by the Senator from Vermont from the Judiciary Committee and in his opinion of yesterday, that either House of Congress has the right to call for these papers by way of information. Under that theory of the Constitution, under that view of the power of removal, the Senator from Vermont is fully justified in stating that either House by virtue of the power it possesses over the matter of removals has a right to call for this information.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, First session Forty-first Congress, page 114, I find this language used by the Senator from Vermont in the debate on the tenure-of-office amendatory act of 1869:

Mr. EDMUNDS. * * * I did not maintain or admit that the removals of the President authorized by a suspension of this act would be unconstitutional, because I have always maintained, as the Senator from Ohio maintains, that this is a subject of legislative power; that it does not belong to the President by the Constitution, but that it belongs to the law; and that if we suspend this act, having confidence for the moment—to attain an object that we all want to attain—in the present Executive, we merely remit him to the act of 1820 and all the other acts that have provided for these officers, which expressly declare that he may remove them.

In that debate is the expression of the opinion that no doubt the Senator from Vermont entertains to-day. I have no doubt that it is the legal opinion of that distinguished lawyer that under the law-making power of Congress the power of removal can be vested in the Speaker of the House, that it can be vested in the presiding officer of the Senate, that it can be vested in the two Houses jointly, because it is a pure creature of law, under the absolute control of Congress in his view.

Hear what Mr. Calhoun said on that subject in the famous debate of 1835. I read from Congressional Debates, eleventh volume, part 1, 1834-'35, page 554:

I ask the Senators to open the Constitution, to examine it, and to find, if they can, any authority given to the President to dismiss a public officer. None such can be found; the Constitution has been carefully examined, and no one pretends to have found such a grant. Well, then, as there is none such, if it exists at all, it must exist as a power necessary and proper to execute some granted power; but if it exists in that character, it belongs to Congress, and not to the Executive. I venture not the assertion hastily; I speak on the authority of the Constitution itself; the express and unequivocal authority which can not be denied nor contradicted. Hear what that sacred instrument says:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—

Those granted to Congress itself—

"and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Mark the fullness of the expression. Congress shall have power to make all laws, not only to carry into effect the powers expressly delegated to itself, but those delegated to the Government, or any department or officer thereof; and of course comprehends the power to pass laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers expressly granted to the executive department. It follows, of course, to whatever express grant of power to the Executive the power of dismissal may be supposed to attach, whether to that of seeing the law faithfully executed, or to the still more comprehensive grant, as contended for by some, vesting executive powers in the President, the mere fact that it is a power appurtenant to another power, and necessary to carry it into effect, transfers it, by the provisions of the Constitution cited, from the Executive to Congress, and places it under the control of Congress, to be regulated in the manner which it may judge best.

That is Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Clay, in the same debate, page 518 of the same volume, said:

The power of removal from office not being one of those powers which are expressly granted and enumerated in the Constitution, and having, I hope, successfully shown that it is not essentially of an executive nature, the question arises, to what department of the Government does it belong, in regard to all offices created by law, or whose tenure is not defined in the Constitution? There is much force in the argument which attaches the power of dismission to the President and Senate conjointly, as the appointing power. But I think we must look for it to a broader and higher source—the legislative department. The duty of appointment may be performed under a law which enacts the mode of dismission. This is the case in the Post-Office Department—the Postmaster-General being invested with both the power of appointment and of dismission.

But they are not necessarily allied, and the law might separate them, and assign to one functionary the right to appoint, and to a different one the right to dismiss. Examples of such a separation may be found in the State governments.

It is the legislative authority which creates the office, defines its duties, and may prescribe its duration. I speak, of course, of offices not created by the Constitution, but the law. The office, coming into existence by the will of Congress, the same will may provide how and in what manner the office and the officer shall both cease to exist. It may direct the conditions on which he shall hold the office, and when and how he shall be dismissed.

There is the support the Senator from Vermont has in claiming this to be a legislative power, the exercise of which is under the control of Congress. I read from a letter of Mr. Madison to Mr. Jefferson upon the subject of the debate in 1789, the character of question discussed and the character of the settlement made by the first Congress:

The bills on the two first of these departments have passed the House of Representatives and are before the Senate. They gave birth to a very interesting constitutional question—by what authority removals from office were to be made. The Constitution being silent on the point, it was left to construction. Four opinions were advanced: 1. That no removal could be made but by way of impeachment. To this it was objected that it gave to every officer, down to tide-waiters and tax-gatherers, the tenure of good behavior. 2. That it devolved on the Legislature to be disposed of as might be proper.

That is the opinion of the Senator from Vermont, supported by the opinions of Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun.

To this it was objected that the Legislature might then dispose of it to be exercised by themselves, or even by the House of Representatives. 3. That it was incident to the power of appointment, and therefore belonged to the President and Senate. To this it was said that the Senate, being a legislative body, could not be considered in an executive light further than was expressly declared; that such a construction would transfer the trust of seeing the laws duly executed from the President, the most responsible, to the Senate, the least responsible branch of the Government; that officers would intrench themselves behind a party in the Senate, bid defiance to the President, and introduce anarchy and discord into the executive department; that the Senate were to be judges in case of impeachment, and ought not, therefore, to be previously called on for a summary opinion on questions of removal; that in their legislative character they ought to be kept as cool and unbiased as possible as the constitutional check on the passions and parties of the other House, and should, for that reason also, be as little concerned as possible in those personal matters which are the great source of factious animosities. 4. That the executive power being generally vested in the President, and the executive function of removal not expressly taken away, it remained with the President. To this was objected the rule of construction on which the third opinion rested, and the danger of creating too much weight in the executive scales. After very long debate, the fourth opinion prevailed, as most consonant to the text of the Constitution, to the policy of mixing the legislative and executive departments as little as possible, and to the requisite responsibility and harmony in the executive department.

I now come to what I consider a most luminous condensation of the whole argument on this subject, and it is said to have been written by Chief-Justice Chase. It was read by his son-in-law, without naming the author, in the debate of 1869. I ask my friend from Mississippi to relieve me by reading it.

Mr. WALTHALL read as follows:

One of the three following propositions is true:

Either the power of removal is one of legislative jurisdiction; that is to say, deriving its authority from act of Congress and subject to regulation thereby;

Or it is a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, only to be exercised by their concurrent act;

Or it is purely a Presidential prerogative.

1. Is it a subject of legislative jurisdiction? Article 1, section 1, of the Constitution provides as follows: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The Congress, therefore, can exercise no other powers than such as are "granted" as above. The powers granted are such as are expressly defined in terms in the Constitution and such derivative powers as may be necessary to carry them into execution, and they constitute the entire body of the legislative powers of the Government of the United States.

If we look now to the Constitution it will be seen that the only grants of legislative power made thereby are to be found in the ten sections constituting article 1; in three paragraphs in section 1; in one paragraph in section 2, and one paragraph of section 3, article 2; in one paragraph in section 1, two paragraphs in section 3, article 4; and one paragraph of article 5; and if we scrutinize all these provisions it will be seen that not only is there no express grant of power over the subject of removal, but that no such power is rightfully to be derived by implication from any of them as being necessary to carry into effect the express grants of power contained therein.

In this view, having thus surveyed the whole field of legislative powers, we find that, so far as the power of removal is concerned, it is not there, either in express terms or by legitimate implication; and not being there, the inevitable conclusion is that it is not of the domain of legislation, capable either of being created or controlled by act of Congress.

2. Is it a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, only to be exercised by their concurrent act?

The argument relied upon to sustain this proposition is that the power of removal is an incident of the power of appointment, and that whereas the joint action of the President and the Senate can alone give validity to appointment, the power of removal is subject to the same condition of concurrent action on the part of the President and of the Senate. That this position is untenable will readily be seen. The provision of the Constitution whence arises the only authority which the Senate exercises in this regard is contained in the second section of article 2 of the Constitution and is in these words: "And he [the President] shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers," &c.

The President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." This is the precise language, and beyond the authority thus granted the Senate has no other in the appointment of officers. What is this authority? In common parlance it is called the act of confirmation by the Senate; but it is not that as a constitutional fact. It is the power to advise and consent after a nomination shall have been made—nothing more. The power of appointment is an independent power vested only in the President. The President nominates, and, the Senate advising and consenting thereto, the President may or may not appoint, as in his executive right and pleasure he sees fit. The function of the Senate in this matter is simply one of assent or dissent, not controlling even the question of appointment; and when it shall have exercised this function in the manner of assent or dissent its constitutional power is exhausted.

In the authority thus given to the Senate of "advice and consent," not only is there no authority vested in that body, either in express terms or by implication, over the subject of the removal of an officer, but not even over the subject of his appointment. The President may nominate; the Senate may exercise its prerogative of advice and consent, and still the President may not appoint. To assume to derive from the terms of this auxiliary intermediate power, thus vested in the Senate, jurisdiction of the subject of removal of an officer is to give thereto an implied signification broader in the scope of its authority as to removal than that which they contain in express terms as to appointment, a conclusion utterly at conflict with the true canons of constitutional construction.

3. Is it or not purely a Presidential prerogative?

Not being found either as a legislative power or as a power vested in the President and Senate jointly, it must be found in the executive branch of the Government, for it could be lodged nowhere else save in the judicial branch, and no one contends for that. But is it not clear from other provisions of the Constitution that it is vested exclusively in the President?

In the first place that it is an executive function is not to be denied, in all governments as well as in our own and by section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution it is provided that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

It is derivable also from the provision of the Constitution (section 3 of article 2) which provides that the President "shall take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed." That the power of removal is essential to the faithful execution of the laws can not be gainsaid. And by the established rule of construction that the express grants of the Constitution carry with them by implication all such powers as are necessary for their execution, herein is found a source of authority for the exercise of this power by the President as undeniable as the fact that for the past eighty years it has been universally recognized.

Mr. PUGH. As a direct authority to support the view of Mr. Madison and the view that is understood to be that of Chief-Justice Chase, just read, I desire to read a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, where the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly tell us what that paper is which was read by the honorable Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PUGH. A paper read by Senator Sprague in the debate in 1869 on the passage of the amendatory tenure-of-office act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Signed by anybody?

Mr. PUGH. He introduced it in these words:

I have not heretofore entered upon the constitutional question involved in this measure; but I have in my hand a paper which embodies my ideas in relation to that point, and so far as I am concerned it makes very little difference to me whether it is the judgment of a lawyer, a judge, or anybody else. The judgment is mine, and I believe that it will stand as the constitutional decision of the question at issue.

The belief was, as I have understood, generally expressed that it was the production of Chief-Justice Chase. From whatever brain that argument originated, I defy the Senator from Vermont to answer it.

In Kilbourn vs. Thompson, 103 United States Reports, Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all the powers intrusted to government, whether State or national, are divided into the three grand departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial.

That the functions appropriate to each of these branches of government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to the others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other.

To these general propositions there are in the Constitution of the United States some important exceptions. One of these is, that the President is so far made a part of the legislative power that his assent is required to the enactment of all statutes and resolutions of Congress. This, however, is so only to a limited extent, for a bill may become a law notwithstanding the refusal of the President to approve it by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress. So, also, the Senate is made a partaker in the functions of appointing officers and making treaties, which are supposed to be properly executive—

Not legislative—

By requiring its consent to the appointment of such officers and the ratification of treaties. The Senate also exercises the judicial power of trying impeachment, and the House of preferring articles of impeachment. In the main, however, that instrument, the model on which are constructed the fundamental laws of the States, has blocked out with singular precision, and in bold lines, in its three primary articles, the allotment of power to the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the Government. It also remains true, as a general rule, that the powers confided by the Constitution to one of these departments can not be exercised by another. It may be said that these are truisms which need no repetition here to give them force. But while the experience of almost a century has in general shown a wise and commendable forbearance in each of these branches from encroachments upon the others, it is not to be denied that such attemps have been made, and it is believed not always without success.

The increase in the number of States, in their population and wealth and in the amount of power, if not in its nature, to be exercised by the Federal Government, presents powerful and growing temptation to those to whom that exercise is intrusted to overstep the just boundaries of their own department and enter upon the domain of one of the others, or to assume powers not intrusted to either of them.

The House of Representatives, having the exclusive right to originate all bills for raising revenue, whether by taxation or otherwise; having, with the Senate, the right to declare war, and fix the compensation of all officers and servants of the Government, and vote the supplies which must pay that compensation; and being also the most numerous body of all those engaged in the exercise of the primary powers of the Government, is for these reasons least of all liable to encroachment upon its appropriate domain. By reason also of its popular origin, and the frequency with which the short term of office of its members requires the renewal of their authority at the hands of the people—the great source of all power in this country—encroachments by that body on the domain of co-ordinate branches of the Government would be received with less distrust than a similar exercise of unwarranted power by any other department of the Government. It is all the more necessary, therefore, that the exercise of power by this body, when acting separately from and independently of all other depositories of power, should be watched with vigilance, and when called in question before any other tribunal having the right to pass upon it, that it should receive the most careful scrutiny.

In looking to the preamble and resolution under which the committee acted before which Kilbourn refused to testify, we are of opinion that the House of Representatives not only exceeded the limits of its own authority, but assumed a power which could only be properly exercised by another branch of the Government, because it was in its nature clearly judicial.

Suppose it had been clearly executive?

The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. If what we have said of the division of the powers of the Government among the three departments be sound, this is equivalent to a declaration that no judicial power is vested in the Congress or either branch of it, save in the cases specifically enumerated, to which we have referred. If the investigation which the committee was directed to make was judicial in its character, and could only be properly and successfully made by a court of justice, and if it related to a matter wherein relief or redress could be had only by a judicial proceeding, we do not, after what has been said, deem it necessary to discuss the proposition that the power attempted to be exercised was one confided by the Constitution to the judicial and not to the legislative department of the Government. We think it equally clear that the power asserted is judicial and not legislative.

If, indeed, any purpose had been avowed to impeach the Secretary, the whole aspect of the case would have been changed.

Why? Because the House had power to originate impeachment, and so could call for information on which to commence that proceeding:

"If, indeed, any purpose had been avowed to impeach the Secretary the whole aspect of the case would have been changed. But no such purpose is disclosed.

There is a recognition of the proposition that when one co-ordinate department intrusted with defined powers calls upon another for information in relation to the exercise of powers belonging exclusively to that other department, it is the duty of the co-ordinate department to inform the other department of the use that is intended to be made of the information, so that it may appear to the other co-ordinate department in possession of the information that it is its duty to transmit it to enable it to exercise a constitutional function or duty. That is precisely the question involved in this case.

But no such purpose is disclosed. None can be inferred from the preamble, and characterization of the conduct of the Secretary by the term improvident, and the absence of any words implying suspicion of criminality, repels the idea of such purpose, for the Secretary could only be impeached for "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Now, Mr. President, let it be true that this is not a substantive executive power of removal vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States alone; let it be true that, like the power of appointment, the Senate shares with the President the power of removal; let it be true that the power of removal is a legislative power and not an executive power, and that the entire regulation of it or the delegation of it belongs alone to Congress under the Constitution—let that all be true, and now I call the attention of the Senate to the expediency and practicability of such a power being exercised by the Senate.

The first witness that I shall introduce upon that subject is President Grant. In his first message to Congress in 1869 be used the following language:

It may be well to mention here the embarrassment possible to arise from leaving on the statute-books the so-called "tenure-of-office acts" and to earnestly recommend their total repeal. It could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, when providing that appointments made by the President should receive the consent of the Senate, that the latter should have the power to retain in office persons placed there by Federal appointment against the will of the President. The law is inconsistent with a faithful and efficient administration of the Government. What faith can an Executive put in officials forced upon him, and those, too, whom he has suspended for reason? How will such officials be likely to serve an administration which they know does not trust them?

The information sought of the Attorney-General by the resolution of the Senate is to enable it, so says the report, to decide whether it will advise and consent to the removal of these suspended officers, so that if it does not advise and consent to the suspension or removal these suspended officers may by operation of the tenure-of-office act go back into their office when the Senate adjourns. What is that but exercising a power by the Senate of selecting the agents for the President to execute his constitutional duty of seeing that the laws shall be faithfully executed? What is that but compelling him to take into his trust and confidence a man whom he has suspended from office?

Now I will introduce the testimony of two of the most distinguished men who have illustrated the history of the Republican party, Senator Morton and Senator SHERMAN, representative men, who, on their personal experience of two years in this body, passed the following judgment upon the operation of that law and the exercise of the power to-day claimed by the Senate. Senator Morton, in the debate on the amendment of the tenure-of-office act in 1869, found in the Congressional Globe, from which I have quoted, used the following language:

It was said by the Senator from Illinois that from the beginning men's minds have divided upon the question as to whether this power of removal existed in the Executive absolutely or in connection with the Senate. That the President might exercise it absolutely in the absence of legislation or restriction is confessed by the continued practice of the Government for seventy-eight years, down to 1867.

But the Senator says the minds of men were divided before that time on the question. Sir, that division did not amount to much. There have been very few questions raised in this country that there has not been something said on both sides within the last seventy or eighty years; but there has been as strong a union of opinion in favor of the exercise of this power by the Executive, in the absence of legislation, as can be found, perhaps, upon the exercise of any other power that is granted by the Constitution. Moreover, there has been a great unity of sentiment from the first that legislation upon that power was not desirable.

My understanding of the tenure-of-office act is that it was adopted for a special purpose; that it was special in its character; that it was intended to meet a condition of things that had never occurred before in the administration, and which we hope will never occur again. It was not made for all future Presidents. Sir, let me ask this question: If the tenure-of-office act had not been passed when it was, and was not now the law of the land, would it enter into the head of any Senator, of any member of Congress, now to pass such a law? The enactment of the law was brought about by a peculiar state of public affairs.

Senator SHERMAN, in the same debate in 1869, used the following language:

But now, when we appeal to the Senate to yield to the President the same power of removal that has been exercised by Washington and every President from Washington down to Johnson, we are referred to old manuscripts that have never been printed before; we are referred to the debates of Webster, and Clay, and Calhoun, &c.

What is the secret of the whole of it? Why, sir, during Washington's administration the anti-Federalists were opposed to Washington, and opposed to his appointing power; they opposed conferring upon Washington the power to remove the Secretary of State. After Washington's administration expired, and John Adams served his fitful four years, with a majority much of the time in both Houses against him, where were those gentlemen then with their notions about the power of the President and the power of removal? In the time of Jefferson and Madison and Monroe, where were those gentlemen who were afraid of executive authority? Did they propose to repeal any of the laws passed in the time of Washington? Not at all.

In the time of John Quincy Adams, Mr. Benton made a speech, which has been read. Then John C. Calhoun, who had quarreled with Andrew Jackson, took up the banner of Benton and made Benton's speech over again, and Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay joined in. If there was so much danger of this executive power, why did not the Democratic party, with a large majority in both Houses, and with a President on their side, repeal these old laws which conferred upon the President the power of removal?

It always has been so, and it always will be so. Notwithstanding all that will be written and said, the ins will try to limit the power of the outs, and the outs will try to limit the power of the ins. There is no doubt about it. When the Democrats are in power the Republicans seek to limit their power. When the Republicans are in power the Democrats, on the other hand, seek to limit their power. So it has been in all times, and I do not think we are any wiser or better than our fathers, and probably no worse.

Again I read from Senator Morton in the same debate:

What is the effect when the Senate becomes a tribunal for the trial of the causes for which men are suspended? Scarcely any officer can be found of any importance who will not have some Senator upon this floor as his friend, and that Senator will stand up and inquire, "What are the causes for which this man has been suspended? I have known him; he is my friend; perhaps I secured him the appointment, and I can not consent to his removal unless there is some tangible and sufficient cause made out." Then the Senate must enter upon the investigation. They must examine into the causes of this man's suspension. Is he an honest officer? If not, what has he done? If he is an incapable officer, wherein has he failed? These are questions we must pass upon.

Each one of these suspensions is a case. If we concur in the suspension after examination, the officer goes out of this Chamber with a blemish upon his character which he can scarcely outlive. If we refuse to concur in the suspension, we say to the world the President has done this man injustice, either intentionally or unintentionally. If he acted in good faith, he acted in ignorance; if he was well informed, then he acted in bad faith or out of malicious feelings toward this man.

The President is in some respects on trial also; and as he is to be put on trial as to whether his judgment has been intelligent or has been an honest one in regard to the man suspended, he must feel a great deal of interest in the result; and if he is to be adjudged in this way he will hesitate a long time before he makes the suspension. He may be satisfied in his own mind that an officer is not doing right, but unless he can procure facts that are tangible in themselves, and that can be laid definitely before the Senate, or can be stated intelligently before a jury, he will not suspend that man, and the maladministration goes on. Will you tell me, sir, that any administration can be conducted efficiently under the operation of that law?

Now, Mr. President, let me suppose that this law remains in force, what will be the effect of it? When we come back here in the month of December—

Here is a description of a state of things existing this very hour—

When we come back here in the month of December we shall find a long docket of these cases of suspensions, perhaps several hundred of them, and they will have to be tried one by one. We take up the first case. That perhaps takes one afternoon or one entire executive session; it may be two or three; and I tell you, sir, that this Senate will not have time, if it devotes its whole time to the consideration of these cases, to pass upon them if the President shall suspend every officer that in his judgment ought to be suspended for dishonesty or inefficiency. It will impose upon the Senate a labor that it can not perform. It will be physically impossible for it to discharge that labor.

There must be responsibility somewhere. The very essence of successful administration under every constitutional government is that the responsibility shall be distinctly located somewhere. Suppose he suspends an officer, and the Senate does not concur in that suspension; that part of the responsibility then belongs to the Senate. It is divided between some sixty or seventy gentlemen on this floor, and the share of each gentleman is very small. If the responsibility is placed between the President and Senate, neither of them will have the whole of it. We divide it up until it amounts to nothing.

Again, from the speech of Senator SHERMAN in the same debate I read as follows:

Has the Senator from Vermont arrrived at that exemplary and forgiving state of mind that he would not be willing to remove any man who disagreed with him in opinion, or, in other words, who was a Democrat, unless he could be convicted of crime upon satisfactory evidence?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Permit me to ask the Senator whether I ought not to have arrived at that virtuous point on true principles of government whether I have or not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think so. I believe that all the leading officers of this Government ought to be in harmony with the political sentiment of the majority, and that although the doctrine of Governor Marcy was rather too bluntly stated in his expression that "to the victors belong the spoils," yet in actual practice, in theory, and in fact no administration of this Government ever did or ever will exist without practically acting upon the rule that to the successful party belong the great offices of the Government. It may not be according to the theoretical codes of morality and public policy which the Federalists talked of when the Democrats were in power, and which the Democrats talked of when the Federalists were in power, but still it is a rule of practical administration which will always be applied in a republican form of government.

Now, in my judgment, the tenure-of-office law can not, with due regard to the public interests, be practically enforced. What has been our experience within two years? When we came back here we were met with piles of documents which the President sent to us; various papers showing that certain officers of the Government had performed acts which in his judgment amounted to misdemeanor, &c., and for which they were suspended. He gave us specific facts and evidence. These cases were referred to the appropriate committees. What were we called upon to examine? We had to take up and carefully read piles of papers and examine each particular case, like a chancellor or a judge of assize. Every suspended officer contended that he was the most innocent man born since the time of Adam. He demanded a trial, and copies of charges and proof and a formal hearing before the committees of this body, he converting us into a court and jury to try his particular case. If we could not try him, why demand charges and evidence?

If the tenure-of-office act was right in principle, we were bound to examine each case to see whether or not the accused officer was, according to the language of the law, guilty of misconduct in office or crime or had become incapable or legally disqualified. "The result was that some of the committees of this body could not transact their business. These cases were referred, and, after great delay, were reported upon. In one case the accused was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary while we were deliberating whether he was properly suspended or not." The result was that we did not and could not determine them.

There probably will be from five hundred to five thousand removals during the next year in the service of the United States in the ordinary course of the business of this country. The number of officers to whose appointment the confirmation of this body is required I should estimate in round numbers at from five to twenty thousand. We know there are great multitudes of them whose appointments require the confirmation of the Senate. If we have to remain here and act upon the cases of all removals, in order to evade the second section, we put ourselves to a great deal of unnecessary trouble merely to evade one of our own laws. If we adjourn, and leave the President without any power to remove, and only the power of suspension, his hands are effectually tied. He can not suspend a postmaster, or a revenue officer, or any of this vast multitude of officers, unless he is prepared upon satisfactory evidence to make out a case of crime or misconduct in office.

It is practically impossible thus to administer the Government. The practical effect of the tenure-of-office act is to keep bad men in office, to divide the responsibility for their misconduct, to enable the President to shield himself from responsibility, and to destroy the energy, efficiency, and unity absolutely necessary in the executive administration of various departments of the Government. That was the practical effect.

Now, Mr. President, look at the actual result as we know it existed. It was the common practice for applicants for office to run here to members of the Senate and say: "I can get an appointment if I am sure of confirmation." There was not a member of the Senate who was not pressed constantly by his constituents to pass his judgment in advance on the question of confirmation and before his appointment. "I can get the appointment if I am sure of confirmation," which reversed the whole order of proceeding in filling the offices of the Government. The Senate became the appointing power; that was the course of business. The result was that many men who had an acute sense of honor, who wished to be free from all this kind of double complication, would not seek or accept office under an administration so hampered and controlled.

The duty of the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments. The Constitution confers on this body no power to remove. We consent to removals; we advise as to confirmations. When a man is removed from office and another name is sent here we pass simply upon his qualification and fitness for the office; but the Constitution confers upon us no power to proceed in the removal. That is conferred only by the tenure-of-office act. Nowhere else do we derive such a power. By the tenure-of-office act the power of removal, as well as the power of confirmation, is conferred on the Senate; and I say with such a power invested in the Senate it will be impossible to avoid controversy and collision between the executive power and the Senate. We shall share in and finally monopolize the power of the Executive over all the offices of the Government.

Senators must very easily draw distinction between the power of removal and the power of confirmation. The power of confirmation is a resulting power, depending on the previous act of another officer of the Government; and all we say in our act of confirmation is whether or not the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office. That power can not and will not be abused; but the power of removal is a very different power, a power never contemplated to be invested in the Senate.

It seems to me that we are now acting as judges in our own case. If this great power of the Senate is maintained to prevent the removal of any officer of this Government, it is maintained by the Senate for its own behalf. The public judgment will say that, although we are not nominally interested, we are maintaining powers that were never conferred upon the Senate until two years ago, and which were then conferred for a special purpose. In my opinion we ought to be careful that our judgment should be impartial, and not to be influenced by a love of power.

* * * * * * *

We share in one-half of the legislative authority of this Government. We are judges over all officers in the trial of impeachment. We participate with the Executive in the power of appointing to office, also in the power to make treaties. I ask if all these great powers are not sufficient for the ambition of any Senate.

* * * * * * *

As a general rule, it is not wise to mingle the powers of the various departments of the Government. There are three great divisions or departments of the Government that stand apart from each other. They form the triangle of public safety, and upon them rest the safety, order, and good conduct of society. These are the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. They have been in exceptional cases mingled. The Senate shares with the President in the appointing power, and also shares with the President in the treaty-making power, &c. It is not wise, in my judgment, to overlook this division of powers.

That is the judgment of two able Senators of great personal experience in the exercise of the power now claimed for the Senate over removals. I read now from Mr. Calhoun in the same speech from which I have already quoted:

The Senator from Tennessee also objects that the measure would be impracticable, and asks, with an air of triumph, What would the Senate do if the reasons of the President should be unsatisfactory? I do not, said Mr. C., agree with those who think that the Senate can or ought to continue to reject the nominations of the President in such cases, until the officer who has been dismissed shall be restored. I believe that course to be impracticable, and that in such a struggle the resistance of the Senate would be finally overcome. My hope is that the fact itself that the President must assign reasons for removals would of itself go far to check the abuses which now exist.

As was proposed in the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee at that time which never passed.

I can not think that any President would assign to the Senate, as a reason for removal, that the officer removed was opposed to him on party grounds. Such is the deceptive character of the human heart, that it is reconciled to do many things under plausible covering which it would not openly avow. But suppose there should be a President who would act upon the principle of removing on a mere difference of opinion, without any other fault in the officer, and who would be bold enough to avow such a reason, Congress would not be at a loss for a remedy, on the principles for which I contend. A law might be passed that would reach the case; it might be declared that the removal by the President, if his reasons should not prove satisfactory, should act merely as a suspension to the termination of the next ensuing session, unless filled by the advice and consent of the Senate.

That is the source of the power of suspension conferred upon the President by the tenure-of-office act in 1867. Here is what Mr. Clay said on the same subject in the same debate:

The next security was that the President, after displacing the meritorious officer, could not appoint another person without the concurrence of the Senate, If Mr. Madison had shown how, by any action of the Senate, the meritorious officer could be replaced there would have been some security. But the President has dismissed him; his office is vacant; the public service requires it to be filled, and the President nominates a successor. In considering this nomination the President's partisans have contended that the Senate is not at liberty to inquire how the vacancy was produced, but is limited to the single consideration of the fitness of the person nominated.

But suppose the Senate were to reject him, that would only leave the office still vacant, and would not reinstate the removed officer. The President would have no difficulty in nominating another, and another, until, the patience of the Senate being completely exhausted, they would finally confirm the appointment. What I have supposed is not theory, but actually matter of fact. How often within a few years past have the Senate disapproved of removals from office, which they have been subsequently called upon to concur in filling? How often, wearied in rejecting, have they approved of persons for office whom they never would have appointed? How often have members approved of bad appointments, fearing worse if they were rejected? If the powers of the Senate were exercised by one man, he might oppose, in the matter of appointments, a more successful resistance to executive abuses. He might take the ground that, in cases of improper removals, he would persevere in the rejection of every person nominated until the meritorious officer was reinstated. But the Senate now consists of forty-eight members, nearly equally divided, one portion of which is ready to approve of all nominations; and of the other, some members conceive that they ought not to incur the responsibility of hazarding the continued vacancy of a necessary office because the President may have abused his powers. There is, then, no security, not the slightest practical security against abuses of the power of removal in the concurrence of the Senate in appointment to office.

Mr. President, I have already consumed much more time than I anticipated. My object was to define the character of this conflict of authority between the President of the United States and the Senate and to fortify the view that I take, which has always been taken by the Democratic party, by authorities commencing in the First Congress and running down to the latest period.

Mr. Cleveland has no fear of an appeal to the people. He is responsible to them. I suppose that the majority in this body have no fear of appealing to the people in favor of the omnipotence of the Senate. I know that we have none in appealing to the people on the omnipotence of the Constitution and the integrity of Mr. Cleveland's administration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yield to his colleague.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will see what my colleague has to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask my colleague to yield to me that I may at this time call up for consideration the urgent deficiency bill. I suppose my colleague will not care to go on at this hour of the evening.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that if it be the pleasure of the Senate, retaining the floor when this measure comes again before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill moved by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let this business be laid aside informally.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be laid aside informally

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending resolutions will be laid aside informally.

Mr. KENNA. That, of course, will leave them the unfinished business for to-morrow?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be laid before the Senate prior to adjournment as unfinished business. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment was, under the head of "War Department," after line 30, to insert:

Funeral expenses of General U. S. Grant: For the payment of all funeral expenses of the late General and ex-President U. S. Grant, as estimated to Congress by letter of the Secretary of the Treasury February 8, 1886, being House Executive Document No. 62, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 37, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of War to lay a new submarine cable, Block Island Bay, fiscal year 1886, $18,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 66, to insert:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer from the appropriation for gas for the Post-Office Department, fiscal year 1886, to the appropriation for gas for buildings for the Money-Order and Sixth Auditor's Offices, fiscal year 1886, a sum not exceeding $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 74, to insert:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year 1886, rent for the building on Capitol Hill used as a branch of the Washington city post-office, at a rate not to exceed $30 per month, for the current fiscal year, or for such part thereof as the said building may be occupied for the purpose aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 82, to insert:

SENATE.

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1886, $3,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask to insert "5" instead of "3" on line 86. On full examination of that item this is necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the amendment by inserting "5" instead of "3," so as to read "$5,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment to come in just after line 82:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

For repairs to water-tank of the main building of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum, Washington, D. C., $260, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MAXEY. I submited an amendment for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act of June 27, 1882, in respect to adjusting the accounts of various States against the Government. The whole amount asked for is $25,000, and the Secretary says, in a letter to me, filed with the papers, that this amount is necessary before he can carry that law into effect. The claims of the States must all stand aside until he can get the necessary appropriation for clerk-hire, rooms, &c., and he asks that the amount be made immediately available. It is within my knowledge that the States have their agents here for the purpose of getting their claims audited, but they can do nothing until this appropriation is made. I offered an amendment to the bill making an appropriation of $25,000, and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that amendment reported by a committee?

Mr. MAXEY. It was presented by me to the Senate and duly referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But was it reported to the Senate from a committee?

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amendment is not in order. It is not in the nature of a deficiency. I will state to the Senator from Texas that the committee, after looking the matter over, thought it ought not to go upon this bill even if it is meritorious upon another account.

Mr. MAXEY. Of course I never contend with the Senator from Vermont on a question of rules, but I had supposed according to the rules that when an amendment was offered in the Senate regularly, and regularly referred to the Committee on Appropriations, that placed it in the possession of the committee as something to be considered, and if the committee failed to act upon it the party moving it had a right to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it must be reported from a committee, except in certain cases that are mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the rule it must be reported from a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain to us this very large deficiency in the Department of Justice for jurors and witnesses. I am bound to suppose that the committee in some way has been able to be informed as to how this deficiency has occurred, so very large as it is, in this year which is now going on, and has in detail some statement of the various districts and places where the money that was regularly appropriated has been expended and how it happens that there is so much more wanted than Congress supposed in February last was necessary for carrying on the Judicial Department of the Government in this way. I hope the Senator will explain it to us.

Mr. ALLISON. I will send to the Secretary's desk a letter of the Attorney-General and ask that that may be read now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 2, 1886.

SIR: The expenses of the appropriations for jurors and witnesses for the current fiscal year (1886) have been so great, that there was available for jurors on the close of Saturday, January 30, 1886, $60,209.60, and for witnesses $4,030.30.

The Department needs, for the remainder of this fiscal year, an appropriation of $50,000 for jurors and $135,000 for witnesses.

At a corresponding period of the last fiscal year Congress appropriated $50,000 for jurors and $100,000 for witnesses.

The expenses of witnesses, however, for the current fiscal year have been so much larger that an additional appropriation of $135,000 ought to made.

The condition of the current appropriation for witnesses appeals forcibly to Congress for an early appropriation, because the $4,030.30 this day available will be soon exhausted.

Estimates of deficiencies are usually presented through the Secretary of the Treasury, but the urgent need of an immediate appropriation is the cause of this application in anticipation of his action.

Very respectfully,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont and to the Senate that the committee did not examine in detail the expenditures for the current fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did you have them before you?

Mr. ALLISON. We did not have them before us; and I will say to the Senator that it is almost impossible to examine these expenditures in detail by any committee of this body during the fiscal year in which they are made. The truth is that the appropriations made last year for this current fiscal year were not enough, as has been shown from the expenditures from year to year for a number of years.

As the statement of the Attorney-General shows, last year there was a deficiency appropriation of $50,000 for the first item and $100,000 for the second, and the appropriation for the current fiscal year for the first item, fees of jurors, was $450,000. The estimate was $500,000, but in the usual economical processes of the two Houses the estimates and, in many instances, necessary estimates have been pared down. The estimate of the Department for fees of witnesses last year for the current year was $610,000, and the appropriation for the last year was $610,000; and yet there was only appropriated in the bill for the current year $550,000. So, if you will accept the additional estimated amount of $25,000, the expenditures would be the same for this current year that they were last year, after this appropriation is made.

The appropriation last year was $610,000 for fees of witnesses, and the amount was expended, and the appropriation this year when this sum is added will be $25,000 more. The Attorney-General gives some reason why this ought to be done for the current year, but——

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean in his letter?

Mr. ALLISON. In his letter. I think, however, the Senator from Vermont will agree with me that it is impossible now to ascertain with absolute accuracy or even approaching accuracy the actual expenditures for the current year. These returns, as the Senator knows, are made by quarters, so that the returns have only been made, if they have all been made according to law, up to the 1st day of January last.

As I will frankly state to the Senate, the committee regarded the statements of the Attorney-General and the experience of that office for the last two years as a safe guide in recommending this appropriation to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it would be gratifying if the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would advise the Senate whether the Attorney-General was interrogated, in addition to the letter that has been read, as to the districts or States wherein the deficit had occurred and the additional expenditures in consequence of which this increased appropriation was necessary. I assume that I shall be answered upon this point by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that no such inquiry was made. After the accusations which for months and for years have been hurled against the administration of the Department of Justice under Republican Attorneys-General, after it has been declared that thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended for political purposes in the Department of Justice, that jurors have been summoned and that cases have been trumped up by political district attorneys to enable witnesses to be summoned from great distances to appear in frivolous cases, and fees paid to them as a reward for political services—after these statements have been made and the announcement has been publicly declared that the administration under President Cleveland and Attorney-General Garland was to be one of economy and reform, after it has been announced that these cases of extravagant expenditure were to be detected and that the country was to be treated with a disclosure as to the corruption and extravagance and profligacy of a Republican administration, I confess that I am somewhat surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, without inquiry, without the slightest interrogation upon the Attorney-General, should present here a bill for a deficiency of $185,000, which by his own confession is $25,000 greater than might have been estimated as the expenditure under the preceding year, without asking for some explanation, without asking for some justification on the part of the Department of Justice, without some showing to the country to which we are responsible for the expenditures of this money, as to the extraordinary discrepancy between the loud professions and protestations of this new administration upon the subject of economy and reform in the public service, and this vastly increased appropriation in a Department that has been a shining illustration of the capacity of the Democratic party for continued and continuous defamation.

No language of invective has been sufficiently violent for years past to enable the Democratic party to characterize the administration of the Department of Justice. It has been declared again and again to have been nothing but a political machine, intended chiefly in the Southern States through the elective machinery by the appointment of superfluous officers, to enable the Republican party to maintain its power and to pay unjustifiable fees to its stipendiaries; and here at the expiration of the first year of this administration of economy and reform the Attorney-General asks, in addition to the appropriations hitherto made, which were declared by the Democratic party to be profligate, unwarranted, and unjustifiable, he approaches and asks for a deficiency appropriation in excess of the amount that was appropriated by the Democratic House of Representatives in their bill—$25,000 in excess of anything that ever was demanded by a Republican administration.

If the Department of Justice needs this money it ought to have it; but I submit, after what we have heard for the last eight or ten years in this body, that it would have been highly appropriate that, before being called upon to vote this excessive appropriation, we should at least have such information as would enable us to say that the criticisms which have heretofore been made upon the expenditures of that Department are unjustifiable and that they were without foundation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, of course it is very difficult for the Committee on Appropriations, as I said before, to secure accurate statements of these expenditures except by quarters. We found on examination that the expenditures for the courts for the last two or three years were substantially those proposed by the Attorney-General for the current year. I called upon the Attorney-General with reference to these deficiencies, and he stated to me that they were necessary in nearly every State in the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And in the Territories as well?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not so clear about the Territories, except the Territory of Utah. There was not a sufficient sum of money, I think he said, in any State, certainly in very few of the States now, to carry on the spring terms of the United States courts, and that in every State, or nearly so, the courts would be suspended unless this appropriation was made.

Of course I agree that that is rather indefinite information; but it is so definite that the committee were satisfied that this appropriation ought to be made, even should it turn out later that there had been an improvident expenditure of the money already appropriated. It is impossible, as the Senator from Kansas will see, for the committee at this time to make a detailed examination and investigation of the expenditures thus far during the current fiscal year.

I have some sympathy with my friend from Kansas, because I have listened year after year to statements that the Department of Justice had been administered in a spirit of extravagance and profligacy and for personal and political ends. But I believed then as I believe now, that that was a mere method of making charges which only had political foundation and political aims; and I am glad to believe now that this administration, economical and virtuous as it is, and with its zeal for reform, has found it necessary in the administration of the Department of Justice to not only require the sums which we have hitherto appropriated for Republican administrations, but also to have an additional sum of $25,000 beyond any sum that has been hitherto expended, so far as I know, by the Department in former years.

I believe that the Committee on Appropriations have made substantial inquiry with reference to the necessity of these two appropriations, and I do not believe that it is within our power to furnish a detailed statement, as I think Senators will readily see, of the expenditures of the appropriations thus far during the current year. I did not ask the Attorney-General for that information, but I have no doubt we could produce a substantial statement of the expenditures for the first half of the year; but that would only be approximate. The accounts of the marshals and district attorneys, in the nature of things, can not have been adjudicated even for the first two quarters of the present fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be a report, if they obeyed the regulations, of their operations and expenditures to the Department of Justice.

Mr. ALLISON. There would be such a report.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is it not true that a large proportion at least of this deficiency is made necessary by exceptional litigation going on in Utah under the Edmunds law for its enforcement, as well as a largely increased litigation in New Mexico over land questions? Is it not an expenditure made necessary by the legitimate operations of the courts and largely in those places?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe the Attorney-General makes some account of Utah in his letter, as he did in his conversation with me; but those extraordinary occasions the Senator will know are occurring all the time. There are new and exceptional cases, but they go into the general range of expenditures for each year. So that made no impression upon my mind. I believe that with the United States courts organized as they are, and having the large amount of business that they have before them in almost every State in the Union, these sums are necessary to carry on the administration of those courts from year to year.

I will say another thing, that it is not within the power of an Attorney-General or head of a Department here to absolutely scrutinize with particularity the expenditures in the courts. Many of these items are to be adjudicated by the judges of the courts, and much depends upon the efficiency and the integrity of the district attorneys and marshals throughout the country, and much depends upon the care with which the judges of the courts scrutinize the expenditures in the several courts, because when the accounts come to the Department of Justice with the indorsement or approval of the judges of the courts, as the law authorizes such approval, it is not perhaps within the province of an Attorney-General in every instance to carefully cut down expenditures.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not exchanged a single word with the Attorney-General upon this subject, nor have I read his report upon the subject, but I inquired for that information which I had a right to suppose was in the possession of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer, if I have not already done so, that the Attorney-General does state in his report and in the letter, if I remember correctly, that there are extraordinary expenditures going on in the Territory of Utah. I have no doubt that is true to some extent, but that does not account for the great amount of deficiency here.

The Senator will see that in the first item of $50,000 the deficiency is made wholly because Congress last year did not appropriate money enough. We were told then, in quarters which I need not name, that with a new administration of affairs where we had expended $500,000 $450,000 would be sufficient, and we consented to that appropriation, although $500,000 had been expended for perhaps two or three years before. Now it turns out that the expenditures of this year are likely to be as great as they were last year. That is all it shows.

Mr. HALE. Was there not, in addition to the appropriations given in the annual bills, a special appropriation last year touching Utah, to provide for the extraordinary expenses to which the Senator from Indiana alludes, and to which the Attorney-General has referred, in addition to all that we gave in the regular appropriation act?

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that there was a special appropriation.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not for the courts; not for jurors or witnesses.

Mr. ALLISON. Not for those purposes.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, not for the purposes included here. Without knowing whether the Attorney-General had raised this question in his report I supposed it must be so, and I find out at last it is so by the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. So I have. The Senator says he finds out at last that it is so. I intended to so state in the beginning, and the letter of the Attorney-General showing that to be one reason was read at the desk.

Mr. VOORHEES. My remark made no reflection upon the fairness and candor of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I intended to be perfectly fair.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course the Senator knows I would be incapable of attributing anything of that kind to him. But I wish to say that this is a growing country; it is enlarging its business, its area of activity, and litigation increases with civilization. Civilization is taking active possession of the Territories, and the expenses of the courts are necessarily increased from year to year, and especially so in the Territory of Utah.

The Senator from Iowa says that to a certain extent these increased expenditures are made necessary by the anomalous condition of Utah. That is all I claim. I did not claim that they were all attributable to the condition of affairs in Utah; but it does not require any Attorney-General's report or the statement of any Senator to show that necessarily the expenses of the courts are enormously increased by the enforcement of the just and proper law known by the name of the Senafrom Vermont. I voted for the law, I believe in its execution, and I believe it is being faithfully executed and working great good, and an increased expenditure on that account is not a fair and legitimate subject of criticism.

I know, too, that the business of the active and enterprising American citizens is increasing largely in the Southwest, in New Mexico, and I need not call attention to the same condition of things in the far Northwest. It is useless to say that there has been extravagance or profligacy in the use of the public money, unless specific items can be pointed out. The Senator from Kansas with his usual eloquence spoke of the arraignments that have taken place heretofore on this floor and in the other branch of Congress on the administration of the Department of Justice. I do not wish to go back into those scenes; but that there were abuses of the fiercest and most criminal character in years gone by, and not merely in spending money but for political ends and aims, I think the future calm, impartial historian will record as beyond doubt. I say that in no party sense, either. Possibly one party in the ascendency would have done just as the other did. I am not prepared to say as to that. One party had fallen in the contest, and it took the consequences, and in many instances they were severe beyond measure and almost beyond the pale of criticism.

I do not think that these scenes and events, however, can fairly be laid parallel with a fair administration of justice here. If there are items of expenditure in the Department of Justice at this time which can be pointed out as improper, unnecessary, or used for unworthy or illegitimate purposes, I stand here to join the Senator from Kansas in condemning them as freely and as far as he will; but not when it comes to vague criticism, and criticism can be made not so vaguely either by the references which I have made to the necessarily increased expenditures for the enforcement of the laws throughout this wide expanding and rapidly filling country.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it is worthy of note that the amount appropriated for the fiscal year to end on the last day of June next ensuing was about $200,000 more than for the preceding fiscal year. The appropriation for United States marshal fees for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, was $612,700, while the appropriation for the year ending the 30th day of next June was $675,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. For what year?

Mr. PLUMB. The first sum is for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1885.

Mr. COCKRELL. For the fiscal year 1885.

Mr. PLUMB. For the fiscal year 1885; the amount being some $63,000 less for the year 1885 than for the year 1886. For United States attorneys $345,000 were appropriated, $325,000 being the regular appropriation and $20,000 special appropriations, making a total of $345,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, while the amount appropriated for the present year was $350,000. That made $5,000 more. We appropriated for 1885 for fees of clerks $160,000, and for 1886 $175,000, an addition of $15,000. We appropriated for jurors for 1885 $400,000, and for the same purpose for 1886 $450,000; that is, an excess of $50,000. For witnesses in 1885 we appropriated $500,000 and for witnesses in 1886 $550,000, being an excess of $50,000 on that item.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Kansas include the deficiencies for last year as well?

Mr. PLUMB. I am speaking of the regular appropriations.

Mr. BECK. Does not the Senator know that we gave in the deficiency bill $50,000 for jurors and $100,000 for witnesses, to make that up?

Mr. PLUMB. So I understand; but that is compensated for by the amount we propose to appropriate here. In other words, the deficiencies were less for that year than they are for this year, while the regular appropriations were about $200,000 more. In addition to that we appropriated for this present year $26,000 specially for Utah. The item is found in the sundry civil act approved last March for the current year which I shall read.

Mr. BECK. I want to hear it.

Mr. PLUMB. It reads as follows:

For the expenses of Territorial courts in Utah Territory: For defraying the contingent expenses of the courts, including fees of the United States district attorney and his assistants, the fees and per diems of the United States commissioners and clerks of the court, and the fees, per diems, and traveling expenses of the United States marshal for the Territory of Utah, with the expenses of summoning jurors, subpœnaing witnesses, of arresting, guarding, and transporting prisioners, of hiring and feeding guards, and of supplying and caring for the penitentiary, to be paid under the direction and approval of the Attorney-General, upon accounts duly verified and certified, $26,000.

Mr. BECK. Is there a dollar for the pay of jurors and the pay of witnesses there?

Mr. PLUMB. No; not for the pay either of jurors or witnesses, but the pay of marshal, the expenses of summoning jurors, guarding, and caring for prisoners, are provided for. That was done in anticipation of what has, I suppose, ensued.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was done also in 1885. The same thing was done the preceding year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; you have got a larger appropriation for the year now going than you had before.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes. That was done in anticipation of what we have witnessed this year, that is to say, prosecutions under the Edmunds law, and it was a sum designed to cover the class of expenses named, which had been shown by experience to be necessary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if that appropriation of $26,000 met all the expenditures that have been incurred under the Edmunds law?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether it has met them or not. It is a pretty large sum of money, however. But as I said, in addition to that the appropriations for jurors, for marshals, for witnesses, and so on, were something over $200,000 more for 1886 than they were for 1885. That is a pretty large excess.

I am not speaking of this now for the purpose of saying that a single dollar of it has been unnecessarily expended, but at the risk of repeating to some extent what may have been said before—I just came into the Chamber—I will say that so far as I know no single appropriation bill has become a law in the last ten years, since I have been in the Senate, that there was not a wrangle between the two Houses about the expenses of the Attorney-General's Department, the House of Representatives under Democratic control asserting that the expenses were too large, that they were improvidently made, that the money was corruptly used and so on, and refusing to appropriate in full; and the Senate more or less actively espousing the cause of the Attorney-General, and would finally succeed in securing the appropriation of a considerable portion of what was claimed.

Now I do not know that the Department was or was not mismanaged, as the Senator from Indiana says it was, but if I were going to act upon the same evidence which his party associates have acted upon heretofore, and charge that the Department was corruptly managed for the reason only that the appropriations for it were large and increasing from year to year, then I should formulate an indictment against the present administration with a great degree of confidence. But I do not do that at all, and I did not rise for any such purpose. I assume that every single dollar of what has been called for is legitimate, according to the present system of expenditures. I know that the accomplished lawyer who is at the head of the Department of Justice would not lend himself to the expenditure of a single dollar that he did not believe to be necessary.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask the Senator from Kansas a question. I do not want any wrangle over this matter if I can help it.

Mr. PLUMB. I am trying to get it out of politics, if I can, into which the Senator from Indiana got it.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he does not know that every dollar paid to witnesses and jurors has to be paid upon the certificate of the judges of the courts, and that the Attorney-General can not refuse to have the money paid when the certificates come in?

Mr. PLUMB. Is that any more true now than it was last year or the year before?

Mr. BECK. Is not every judge, with one or two exceptions, now just as he was then, a Republican?

Mr. PLUMB. Is he not just as honest now as he was then, or is he any more honest now than he was then? The reform has not extended that far, perhaps.

Mr. BECK. Therefore I do not see why the present Attorney-General and the present administration are being charged with extravagance in this regard when every one of the accounts was certified by judges who are now and were then Republicans, and the Attorney-General can not refuse to pay them.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not charge anything of the kind at all. I only said that if I were to follow the example which the Democratic party had set for the last twelve or fourteen years in the House of Representatives, and charged corruption simply because the amounts asked for were large, as they assumed to believe, and because they increased from year to year, then I should formulate an indictment against the Democratic party and against the administration with great confidence.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say only one word more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PLUMB. I do.

Mr. BECK. The charges made by the Democratic party have not been as to the mismanagement or wrong action of the courts. The charges have been made because the marshals and deputy marshals have been sent to the polls under Davenport in New York, and under others elsewhere, and have been paid outside of appropriations after Congress had refused to make appropriations to pay them. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid to marshals outside of all appropriations, because it was assumed they had a right to be at the polls and control elections. These are the things that we have complained of and charged, and if necessary we can again prove them. I shall move to go into executive session pretty soon, so that we can look into this matter tomorrow.

Mr. PLUMB. I can only remark in reply that Mr. Davenport and the election machinery in the Attorney-General's Department in Republican times must have been a very economic institution, because it cost $200,000 less to carry on the Department at the time it had charge of elections and was being run by John Davenport than it does now when we are having honest administration!

What I said was simply introductory to what I was about to make use of for the purpose of illustrating what I think is needed now in connection with expenditures in this Department. I repeat now what I said before, that while I have not come to the consideration of this question with any partisan purpose at all I think it is fair to call attention to the fact, as has been done, that the expenses now are much larger than ever heretofore, and that the opposition party is not now doing as the opposition party of the former time did; it is not making a general run and jump at the Department because these expenses have increased. There has been no proposition to deny the proper appropriation, and there was no question of the amount in the committee. On the contrary, the committee said simply what the chairman has expressed here. We found that these expenses were going on, and that the courts were still to be maintained, if at all, by the payment of expenses during the time that will elapse until the close of the fiscal year. We did not think it wise or proper in any sense to stop the administration of justice. We did not deem it necessary to enter into any critical inquiry in regard to this matter, but were perfectly willing to accept the judgment of the Attorney-General as to what was necessary for the remainder of the fiscal year.

I say further what I take pleasure in repeating, that I do not think any person on this floor on either side of the Chamber imputes to the present occupant of that office a design to use one single dollar of this money either improperly or extravagantly. I have no doubt in the world that he is exercising all the supervision that he possibly can, and I accord to him just as much discrimination in that particular, and just as much integrity and determination to do his full duty as I would claim for anybody else.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to set one matter right. I understood the Senator to attribute to me a purpose or the effect of giving the discussion on this question a political bias. The Senator did not hear his colleague, I presume, in the opening debate.

Mr. PLUMB. He could not have made it any worse than you did.

Mr. VOORHEES. He preceded me; and if the Senator did not hear his colleague I will advise him to read his remarks in to-morrow's RECORD, and see whether they contain any political bias or not. I was simply, in a very faint and feeble and far-in-the-rear manner, trying to follow the footsteps of the distinguished colleague a little in fending off.

Mr. PLUMB. Ah, Mr. President, that is a vain attempt; it will not do me any good for to-day what I shall be able to read to-morrow in the RECORD. I heard the Senator from Indiana say what I think he said rather hastily, and which I do not think there is any evidence for, that there undoubtedly had been a very corrupt administration of the Attorney-General's Office in years preceding. I do not think anybody has any proof of that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not say that. I did not use the word "corrupt" in the sense of money, but I said it had been oppressive and had been used for political ends. If that means corruption, it will have to have that meaning. I said I believed that the future impartial historian would say so, and I say it again.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator think that we have got changed in that way for the better now? I suppose he is willing to certify that none of this money would be used for political ends.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think not.

Mr. PLUMB. Or that it will be hereafter so used?

Mr. VOORHEES. If there is any of it so used, I will set an example which never has been set by the Senator's party, and that is, I will help to condemn it. I never heard any condemnation on that subject from him.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not in the habit of replying to charges that are not substantiated. I never have heard in any discussion on the subject on this floor or elsewhere in regard to a misappropriation of money a single scintilla of proof, and yet the contention was always the same. Just as sure as the House of Representatives was in the hands of the Democratic party it refused to make the full appropriation to carry on this Department of the Government, and it was charged that there had been a misappropriation and that a reform was needed. In fact, the idea of the Democratic party seemed to be that the whole Government was administered for political ends. I think it is pretty well administered that way now, but the party does not seem to be enjoying the situation quite as much as we are. They had the fun of the thing while we had the majority and we have the fun of it now.

These expenditures are widely scattered, are going on all over the country in such a way that it is impossible for the Attorney-General, however active and zealous he may be, to properly discharge the other duties of his great office and have that supervision which must necessarily be had by somebody over these expenses in order to bring them within proper limits. And I shall consent to this appropriation with a perfect belief that the Attorney-General has done all that he could do, but with an equal belief that if the matter had been properly managed, if these expenses had been subjected to proper scrutiny, we should not have been confronted by this deficiency, or, at least, so large a one.

The Attorney-General is not responsible for that. Congress is primarily responsible for it. Here are the marshals in every district of the United States, the attorneys and the clerks, the United States commissioners in all of them, and all the paraphernalia and detail of the operations of this great Department being carried on at a great distance from the seat of Government, in a manner without the supervision of anybody, with nearly all the compensation being paid in fees, and with the constant temptation, therefore, before every one to make as much business as possible. The system is wrong. It ought long since to have been remedied; it ought to be remedied now. If it were possible to create an officer, to delegate to somebody the proper authority who could be relied upon to keep this active, thorough scrutiny of all the accounts of all the courts and all the marshals and commissioners and district attorneys and so on, as there ought to be, I have not the slightest doubt the Government would save at least $200,000 every year.

I have brought attention to this for the sole purpose of saying what I have now said about the irresponsible system under which this money is expended and calling the attention of the Senate to it with the hope that out of this discussion would grow some amendment of the system whereby what I believe to be a careless, sometimes undoubtedly a corrupt use, of money is made, not corrupt in a party sense, but corrupt in the personal sense, fictitious fees for marshals, unnecessary fees for services in other cases, and so on. It is within the power of the marshal, as against almost anything the court may do, to run up large bills.

It is true the Attorney-General, as I know he does in some of the districts, says, "You can have only so much money," but a condition of things comes about that seems to require more and the judge says we ought to have more, and the marshal says we ought to have more, and the clerk says we ought to have more, and the Attorney-General yields and the allotment is made greater. He has only a minor control over it. He can not give it that control which he would like to give. And so of the accounts in the Treasury Department. It is true they are revised first by the Attorney-General or some one in his office, but still it is all done at arm's length. Back of it all there ought to be some keen oversight, the drastic hand of some one who not only knows what ought to be expended, but with the courage and the integrity to enforce that knowledge. I am not prepared to suggest a way in which this may be done.

While I am on this subject of deficiencies, I wish to call attention to the fact that while the law prohibits the creation of obligations against the Government beyond appropriations, except in minor cases, every year we appropriate from five to seven million dollars to meet overexpenditures. I have felt sometimes as though one of the remedies would be for Congress to say, "We will not appropriate a dollar, and we will let the public interests for the time being in certain directions go, in order that we may accomplish the greater good of putting a compulsion upon those who spend money to bring their expenses within the amount appropriated by law."

For instance, the law of last year and the year before said in regard to the care of public buildings that the Secretary of the Treasury should bring all those expenses within $300,000, just as plainly nominated as words could make it; and yet among the very first documents met in the Appropriations Committee-room was a request from the Secretary of the Treasury that we give him more money to carry on the public-building service until the end of the present fiscal year, the appropriation being practically exhausted already. I do not speak of that to blame the Secretary. It is part of that custom which has grown up in administration circles—and when I say "administration circles" I speak without any reference to the politics of the head of the administration—but it has come to be so that those people who spend money in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, and everywhere, too much regard Congress as only a pliant tool to give them, whenever they demand it, whatever money they want, and if they do not get it in the first instance all they have to do is to create a deficiency, and then they come down to us with the certainty of getting it.

I have seen a good deal of that, as all the other members of the Committee on Appropriations have. I would be glad to stop some great Department of this Government for three or four months in order to enforce upon the men who administer it and the other Departments the fact that when Congress says only a certain amount of money shall be spent it is meant, and that no more is to be spent, and they must cut their coat according to the cloth. But no, they know that administrations come and administrations go, and they go on spending money, and when they have started on a certain scale of expenditure merely fixing the amount of money they are to have will not stop them.

They come to Congress and say, "You will not stop the work of that great Department." There surely will come up at the close some talk about a soldier's claim, some horse claim, or something of that kind. Some poor fellow to whom is owing $100 is made to bring up the rear, is made the means of enforcing a claim on us for additional appropriations. "Give this money or we must cut off these worthy people." The people who have the largest sum, the people who are the least worthy, the people who are to some extent participants in this violation of the law, have had their money and are gone, but now "if you do not give us the balance of this, of course some poor fellow will not get $100 for his horse lost, or some poor soldier will not get his bounty." The few hundred thousand dollars there are in this bill, are simply a bagatelle to the general deficiency bill that will come in and be passed before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, a great deal of noise is being made over a very small matter. This is what has occurred for years. It occurred last year. On the 3d day of last March we passed through this body a deficiency bill giving $50,000 in one item and $100,000 in another; for fees of jurors $50,000, and for fees of witnesses $100,000, and no great noise was made about it. It was done the preceding year; it has been done almost every year. It is almost impossible for any head of a Department to estimate accurately the exact expenses that will be incurred for jurors and witnesses. There may be very few cases in court requiring the attendance of jurors; there may be very few witnesses, or there may be many witnesses and the jurors may be detained week after week and month after month. Some grand juries will meet and adjourn in a week or ten days; some will be in session for three months; and so it is with the petit jurors.

In 1885 the same kind of an appropriation was made for Utah, $26,000, that is made in 1886. In 1885 the estimates of appropriation for fees of jurors for 1885-'86 were $500,000, and the estimates for fees of witnesses were $610,000. Four hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for jurors and $500,000 for witnesses. We made an additional appropriation of $50,000 and $150,000. For the fiscal year 1885–'86 the appropriations were $450,000 and $550,000. The same amount is estimated for the fiscal year 1887, $450,000 and $550,000, respectively.

These items occur from year to year. Every year deficiencies are provided for. Some of them I confess that I view in the same light as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], regarding them as violations of the law. This is not a violation of the law, this is not a deficiency already incurred; it is to provide for witnesses and jurors to be summoned in the courts from now till the end of the fiscal year. The cases are pending, and the Attorney-General has simply had the foresight to advise Congress that these amounts are necessary in order that the fees of the jurors and witnesses may be paid when the courts close. I see nothing political in the matter at all, and I see no occasion for anything political in debating it.

Mr. President, the fate of the Democratic administration of this country will not be determined by the criticisms of this item and that item. It will stand upon the record it makes year by year, and when the books are closed and the accounts adjusted at the end of the fiscal year, then it will be responsible for the administration. There may be items of expenditure for some particular thing largely in excess of what they were under Republican administration, and there may be items that will be much smaller than they were, and you can only judge of an administration by its record when that record is completed on the 30th day of June in each fiscal year.

These items are necessary and they are not extravagant; and the Attorney-General or the Department of Justice has very little control over them. The jurors are summoned, the witnesses are subpœnaed, their accounts are passed upon by the judge, and they are audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department where all other accounts are audited and adjusted, and I think the Attorney-General did exactly right in sending to us and asking that this appropriation be made in advance of the time when the jurors and witnesses would be subpœnaed to attend in the courts, and their certificates would be given to them and there would be no money to pay them. That would be incurring an expenditure before the appropriation was actually made.

Now, Mr. President, these items of expenditure for this fiscal year have almost entirely been contracted and have accrued under Republican officials. Over half the United States marshals and district attorneys and nearly all of the judges are Republicans, and there is no occasion for any effort or attempt to cast a stigma upon the Attorney-General or upon the administration because this deficiency has been asked for. If a clean sweep had been made last spring early and all the Republican officials had been turned out and Democrats had been put in, and the expenses had been increased, there might have been a reasonable suspicion.

Mr. PLUMB. I suppose the Senator is going to admit that in that case probably the deficiency would have been about three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it would have been quite as large. I think money would have been saved.

Mr. PLUMB. Then why so slow in making changes?

Mr. COCKRELL. I belong to the legislative branch and not to the administrative branch, and those two departments are wholly independent of each other, and it is wrong for either branch to undertake to dictate to or control the other in the exercise of its legitimate duties, or even to ask for its reasons. I admit that if I had had the control of the administrative branch a cleaner sweep would have been made than has been made.

Mr. PLUMB. And you would have taken the risk of a deficiency?

Mr. COCKRELL. I would have taken the risk of a deficiency because, as I say frankly, the incumbents of the offices of marshal and district attorney and offices of that kind are those which every administration, Republican or Democratic, ought to have in sympathy with it. I believe that they are a part and parcel of the administration, and those officers ought be in sympathy with the administration, whether it is Republican or Democratic.

Now, sir, there have been more prosecutions in Utah probably during this fiscal year than in any year that has preceded it. The expenditures have been necessarily large. There have been probably more trials had in some of the district courts in New Mexico than usual. I happen to know of one instance where a judge who was appointed from my own State and went there has had his court almost continuously in session disposing of a large number of cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean United States cases?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; a number of them were. As a matter of course a good many of them were not; but there were some of them United States cases, I suppose. I know that his court has been in session all the time nearly, continuously.

Mr. President, I think these items are perfectly legitimate and just, and there is no controversy about them. There never has been so far as I know any controversy about appropriations for jurors and witnesses. I have never heard those items controverted before in the Senate. If they have been, I have forgotten it. I know that different bills have come in and we have passed upon and allowed them without any quibble. As a matter of course, we all know there has been a good deal of contention over the appropriations for United States deputy marshals, and supervisors of elections, and the paraphernalia appointed under the election laws. We all remember the controversy over that subject, but there never has been in either branch of Congress, so far as I know, any controversy in regard to these matters, and I see no occasion for it now.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me the general complaint made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as to deficiencies is hardly fair to the several Departments of the Government in the past or the present. If six or seven million dollars of deficiency are presented to this body every year, it is a very evident proposition that either the Departments have very grossly abused the power given to them or Congress has failed to do its duty. If the Departments have been expending six or seven million dollars a year more than they ought to have done, it seems to me it was the duty of the proper branch of the Government to take such steps as would compel the cessation of that class of expenditure.

Now the fact is, and I have no doubt it will be true with this case as it has been with all others in the past, that the department of the Government which holds the purse and votes the money votes it with a grudging disposition; and the heads of Departments come to the Committees on Appropriations of both branches of Congress as if they were supplicants asking for special personal favors when they come for the purpose of receiving the means of executing the laws which they are sworn to execute. Appropriations are voted to them as if a favor was conferred upon the head of a Department, and more than one Department would have been compelled to close its doors within the last three years, as I know, if it had not made expenditures beyond the amount that had been given by Congress.

Does anybody suppose that the Interior Department should have suspended and cut off its work because it did not have fuel, as it did not have in 1884? The contingent expenses allowed were not sufficient to carry on the work and keep the Department buildings heated. Does anybody suppose that the land offices all over the country should cease their operations because there had been $27,000 less appropriated to pay the land officers than the law had provided their salaries should be? The Departments are compelled to go on and make deficiencies or to close their doors and cease business. I could take the last deficiency bill and call your attention to the fact that nearly every Department was short in the appropriations for lights and fuel. You appoint men to do certain work; you send them into the field, and you provide for them by a per diem. You fail to appropriate a sufficiency of money to pay the actual expenses of travel, and they are compelled to return and stay where they can be of no public service whatever, or else the Department must go on and allow them to incur a debt.

There are two sides to this question. I have not any doubt that some of the Departments are sometimes extravagant; but I think every man who has had any experience in an Executive Department of the Government knows that there is a disposition on the part of the head of that Department, if possible, to keep within the appropriations that are made; but when he finds that it is impossible to do so, he is expected to carry on the business, and if he did not do it he would be censured. You appropriate money for Indians; it is insufficient, and the head of the Department knows that if he keeps the Indians on the rations provided by that appropriation it will be death on the reservation and disgrace to the public service. He knows that the Indians must be either fed there beyond the appropriation or they will make raids upon the settlers, or else they must be kept by the Army there to die for want of food. In a hundred instances of this kind every Department of the Government is compelled to go beyond the appropriations made. Take for instance the very case where the appropriation is said to be insufficient and has been so for several years in this very Department. The courts are organized and men are indicted and put upon trial; how can the Department here beforehand say how many dollars will be wanted for witnesses? How can they say how long the trial will last, or how many people will infringe the law, and how many people shall be punished? You must give to the Department some discretion in these matters.

I have not any doubt but that in every administration there has been abuse of power. I have not any doubt that under any administration since this Government was organized it can be found there are expenditures, sometimes in one Department and sometimes in another, which are improper. I have not any doubt but that has been the case within the last twelve months. I have called the attention of the Attorney-General to what I think is a gross violation of law and a useless expenditure of money. I do not hold him responsible; he has instituted an inquiry, and if he finds the charges are correct I have not any doubt but what he will remedy the evil in a summary manner.

I do not propose to say of this administration what I would not say of any other. There must be some discretion given to the heads of Departments, or else you must vote a sum of money far in advance of what is actually necessary in many instances for the proper conduct of the business of the Departments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the upshot of the whole of this business is that the total appropriations, putting deficiencies and everything together, for this current fiscal year in the respects that we are now speaking of are to be greater than they were in the year before. That would seem, as the Senator from Kansas stated, to show either that the present administration of affairs was more corrupt and extravagant than its predecessors had been, or that the accusations against the preceding administrations had not been well founded. To my mind there does not seem to be any escape from that dilemma.

I called attention to this matter in the first place, for the simple purpose, in the absence of any specific information, of having the Senate vote under reserve these appropriations that ought to be made. The money is gone, and we must have more money to carry on these affairs. But I want our action to be such that it can not be said afterward that the Senate had approved the expenditures which had already been made by the simple circumstance without any comment that they had passed these deficiencies. I hope no politician and no Democrat and no Republican will complain of that.

Whatever may be the powers of the Executive and of his Departments, if he had any, as he has not under the Constitution and the laws—they are the Departments of the law—whatever may be their powers, I suppose everybody will agree that in respect of the expenditure of money the two Houses of Congress still have some rights of inquiry and comment and consideration left. If that be so, then it would not be thought impertinent, I suppose, to ask how it comes about that this deficiency has occurred. Naturally, no doubt, in a great many respects it is proper to provide for it, to which we all agree, because as I say the money is gone and the Attorney-General (for whose personal honesty and good intentions in every respect I have as great regard as I have for that of any man in the world) has been drawn into this matter in this way. I think it can be accounted for in a way that can be very easily stated, although his appropriations for this year, taking them all together, are greater than his predecessor's, not for the reason stated by the Senator from Indiana as to Utah, for that has been specially provided for although it may be that in some part the expenses have been in excess even of the special appropriations in addition to the general ones.

Mr. COCKRELL. The special appropriation did not refer to jurors and witnesses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The general appropriation covers all parts of the Government, and is not for any special Territory or special State; it is left entirely to the discretion of the Department of Justice as to where the money is wanted for carrying on the judicial operations of the United States; but I think that the excess of this year—and I am bound to say it fairly and without any reference to what are called party politics—has arisen from the fact that has been stated to me in letters which I have received from persons whom I believe to be people who intend to tell the truth—they may be mistaken—that the new district attorneys to whom more than to anybody else the beginning of excessive expenditures is to be attributed always in the management and institution of prosecutions—that the new district attorneys in their new zeal have gone around and, particularly in the Territories, have thought it fit to institute prosecutions largely beyond the justice of cases and prosecutions, that when they were brought before the new judges in the Territories designated to take the place of those who were suspended——

Mr. COCKRELL. Very few of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I know that there is a very considerable number of them. Taking the nine Territories, we have got a considerable number of them. I say the judges, as I am informed, have found it necessary to quash or to dismiss instantly these indictments. I am making no political criticism, because it might have happened if the Democrats had been in twenty-five years and the Republicans had come in now. I am not speaking of politics; I am speaking of facts. I am advised that in one Territory a designated appointee of the President got up—I have forgotten the number—a very large number of prosecutions, every one of which, as it is stated (which may be an extravagance; it would be almost impossible to suppose it) when brought into court was immediately dropped.

Mr. COCKRELL. In what Territory?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think, considering the other body that we are supposed to belong to and not this body, as some of these subjects are under consideration there, that I had better name the Territory just now. By and by we shall probably all know. Since I have found out that we are two separate states of being here, I must be a little careful about what I say when we are in this present existence. When we come into another I shall say something else.

There is the real trouble about these expenditures in the Department of Justice. The Attorney-General can not help it otherwise than by giving notice to the official whom the law says he shall supervise that if he finds a given district attorney has been instituting prosecutions, a large proportion of which fall and drop without trial, he will recommend to the President of the United States, if he is a designated man, to dismiss him at once, and if he is a regular man to suspend him at once, and ask the Senate of the United States, which never has yet failed on such an occasion, to agree to his removal. There is where the trouble comes. Before the Attorney-General can know it, when he attributes to Territory A or to the State of Vermont a certain amount of money to be spent for jurors and witnesses and so on, and he has a district attorney who, for the purpose of gain, for the purpose of a misguided zeal, to show how thorough he is, or whatever, proceeds to institute a large number of useless and frivolous and imperfect prosecutions which are immediately dropped when the facts are known, then I say the Attorney-General, if he fails to bring men of that sort to book immediately has failed in his duty. I express no opinion upon any topic that is now before the Attorney-General on any such subject. I may in what I am now told is another place say something about that. That is where the difficulty comes in with regard to these expenses.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Vermont now just imagine himself in the other place and let us know it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I am not an imaginative man; quite the reverse. I am simply a man of facts.

Now as to Utah. Undoubtedly there have been greater expenditures in the courts there for jurors and witnesses and other items of expense than in the year before; but the Attorney-General in his letter asking for these appropriations makes no reference to that circumstance. How far it is an element in this deficiency we have no means of knowing. But I am bound to impute to the Attorney-General as to Utah, as I do most gladly, a thorough desire to enforce the laws there in their fullest and justest and most thorough way; and every penny of money that is necessary in the most liberal way to help him do it I am ready and I believe the Senate is ready to give. And what has been said has not been said with the design of preventing this appropriation which ought to be given, but, as I said before, of having the Senate understand in the absence of detailed reports of these expenditures that it is voting under reserve and is not committing itself to an approval without knowledge of what has gone before.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, as this discussion is likely to be prolonged indefinitely and a short executive session is necessary in regard to some matters, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before that motion is put the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. It is important that this bill be passed at an early day, and I called it up now in order that I should not interfere with the regular business.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If we can have a short executive session after this bill is passed, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; let us finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MCPHERSON, I withdraw the motion for an executive session if we can have a vote on the bill.

Mr. BECK rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky rise to speak on the bill?

Mr. BECK. I do, but only to say a word. The charges of mismanagement and corruption in regard to this bill and matters connected with the Attorney-General's office I think will all prove not to be well sustained, but I desire time until to-morrow morning to look into them, and it may be that I shall move to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to summon the Attorney-General and these officials and see what the facts are; because if there is no mismanagement, no corruption or any such thing as the senior Senator from Kansas intimated, let us go the bottom of the affair, now that we have ample time, and it will be quite as profitable as the discussion which is going on here.

Mr. INGALLS. To which Senator from Kansas does the Senator from Kentucky refer?

Mr. BECK. The Senator now addressing me.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BECK. I will read the debate in the morning.

Mr. INGALLS. I never cast the slightest imputation upon the Attorney-General. I made no expression indicative of a belief in extravagant or improper appropriation of the money. I merely said what I did say for the purpose of pointing a moral and adorning a tale.

Mr. BECK. I will see in the morning what the RECORD shows that the Senator said, and there see how much is adorned and pointed. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCPHERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I appeal to the Senator from New Jersey to let us pass the bill. We can do it in a few moments.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I supposed the Senator from Iowa consented that we might go into executive session.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw his motion?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I withdraw it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CALL. Before the vote is taken on this bill I wish to say a few words.

The laws of this country make it imperative upon the district attorney to present the cases that arise to the grand jury. He has no discretion further than advising them as to what the law is. The marshal is obliged to execute the writs, whatever they are. All is dependent upon the decision of the judge in the approval of the accounts. The law is compulsory. It is not possible that any large portion of this deficiency should have occurred from the mere finding of indictments on frivolous pretexts. That is a very inexpensive proceeding; but under the law the service of process is compulsory, and the mere advice, whether correct or incorrect, that the district attorney gives to the grand jury in finding a true bill is a very small part. It can not possibly increase the expense. The judge may hold his court, as I have known a judge to hold it two days in the week.

How can the Attorney-General or the Congress of the United States or any one else interfere with that discretionary power of the judge? And when he executes his function as a judge holding court in his discretion for one, or two, or three days, there is no power that can supervise the expenses incident to the exercise of this discretionary authority, and here is a bill upon which there can be no such charges predicated. The judge has a power conferred on him independent of Congress, and in the exercise of that judicial function there is no law of Congress that can interfere, and the expenses incident to it must be borne. I know of no way in which Congress can interfere with the action of a judge and the expense incident to it. Therefore, this is a bill for the expenses under which the judges are responsible.

Every item of expense is under the judge's supervision and under his orders. It is to him that the marshal and the district attorney must look to be checked and controlled in order that the number of witnesses that are to be examined, the time that is to be consumed, which is the great expense, the time the judge holds the witnesses and the jurors, and the number of witnesses that he allows to be examined in the trial of a cause, may be supervised by the judge. These are matters which are entirely, as the Senator from Vermont must know better than I, in the discretion of the judge alone, and which Congress can not interfere with.

Therefore, sir, this whole criticism is entirely out of place. The Attorney-General is no more responsible for the deficiency in this bill than are the Senators of this body or the members of the other House.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope this bill will be permitted to be passed this evening. It is really an important one, and I hope we shall be permitted to finish it.

Mr. ALLISON. We are ready to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolutions reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] from the Committee on the Judiciary, February 18.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LOUTTIT, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STRUBLE, for five days after the expiration of his present leave of absence, on account of important business.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution of March 8, 1866, to authorize the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to have printed copies of the testimony and papers relating to the disbursement of the public money by the Chief Signal Office, have instructed me to report the same with an amendment, so that it will read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be authorized to have printed for the use of the committee the testimony and papers relating to the disbursement of public moneys by the Chief Signal Officer, taken before said committee, and such other matters as may appertain to their investigation, the cost of the same not to exceed $500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the standing and select committees for reports.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 6664) to increase the naval establishment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 150) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in said State; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, READING, PA.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1983) to increase the appropriations for the erection of a public building at Reading, Pa.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also reported, as a substitute for the bil H. R. 2420, a bill (H. R. 6665) for the erection of a public building at El Paso, Tex.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 2420 was ordered to be laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LYNN, MASS.

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 1098, a bill (H. R. 6666) for the erection of a public building at Lynn, Mass.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 1098 was ordered to be laid on the table.

CALVIN GUNN.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5313) for the relief of Calvin Gunn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRON MOUNTAIN BANK, SAINT LOUIS, MO.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4570) for the relief of the Iron Mountain Bank, of Saint Louis, Mo.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN ELLIS.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3908) for the relief of John Ellis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3843) for the relief of John Ellis; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. PULITZER, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 1747) to repeal an act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States approved January 16, 1883.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I ask that the bill, with the adverse report, be referred to the proper Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill, with the adverse report, will be referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, obtained leave to file the views of the minority of the committee on said bill.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3752, a bill (H. R. 6667) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," requiring said Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the lands granted to said railroad; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 3752 was ordered to be laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration Senate bill 141, extending the provisions of the act in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods to the port of Omaha.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees under the rule for the consideration of reports. The hour begins at twenty-nine minutes past 12 o'clock.

The Committee on the Militia was called.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The Committee on Labor was called on yesterday when but seven minutes of the hour remained. Does that comprehend all the time to which a committee would be entitled under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Unless the hour expired while the House was considering a bill called up by the committee, in which event the committee would have so much of the hour next day as would be necessary to conclude the consideration of that bill; but it could call up no other bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. But if a bill was called up within seven minutes of the close of the hour its consideration could go over until the following day?

The SPEAKER. Yes; to the following day.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. As there are several important measures which have been reported from the Committee on Labor, I ask unanimous consent that next Saturday be set apart for considering reports made by that committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a special order of the House assigning every Saturday for general debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask to have that order vacated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, asks unanimous consent that the order of the House heretofore made setting apart next Saturday for general debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be vacated, and that that day be set apart for the consideration of the reports from the Committee on Labor. Is there objection.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not insist on his objection. The Committee on Labor has only had seven minutes.

Mr. CRISP. It will have its hour when the committee is called in its order.

Mr. DINGLEY. It may be a month or more before the committee is called again.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor be allowed one hour to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor be allowed to occupy an hour for the consideration of bills to-day.

Mr. BLAND. There are other committees having important measures to present which are waiting their turn to be called.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. BLAND. I would not object to the assignment of next Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object? If no objection is made, the Committee on Labor will be called to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the Chair whether the committee is not entitled to one hour to-day, under the rule, for the purpose of presenting reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has just asked unanimous consent that his committee should be called to-day.

Mr. BLAND. I thought I had objected to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked twice if the gentleman from Missouri objected and received no response.

Mr. BLAND. I called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman call for the regular order. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to be heard for a moment on the construction of this rule. The rule says:

Whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day—

Now I hold under the reading of this rule the committee is entitled to one hour of time, when it is called, for the purpose of presenting measures for consideration. The rule otherwise might allow a committee only two minutes. This committee, as I understand, had only five minutes yesterday in which to present reports for consideration.

A MEMBER. Seven minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I hold under this rule two hours of time are allowed to committees for the consideration of their reports. On the first day they are allowed sixty minutes of time to present reports. I will read the rule further:

And when any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call, it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as unfinished business.

I hold that means that each committee is entitled to two hours of time, and that it can not be construed to mean that a committee shall only have a portion of one day. It shall have two hours, one hour to present measures for consideration and another hour, if a matter is unfinished, to complete its consideration.

The SPEAKER. What construction, then, would the gentleman from Illinois put upon that clause of the rule which expressly provides the committee shall not call up any other bill during the hour on the second day? The House concluded the consideration of the bill which was called up by the Committee on Labor yesterday, and if the Committee on Labor has the floor this morning, it must call up another bill in direct violation of the provision of the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that should be construed in connection with the clause of the rule which allows a committee one hour on one day, and another hour the following day for the conclusion of a measure which has been called up. Otherwise, a committee called only two minutes before the expiration of the hour might only be able to call up one bill.

The SPEAKER. But if the committee should be called this morning, what could they do?

Mr. SPRINGER. They could go on till they had occupied one hour.

The SPEAKER. Not under the rule, because it provides expressly:

And whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day, it shall not be in order for such committee to designate any other proposition for consideration until all the other committees shall have been called in their turn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand. "The said hour," that means that they must have an hour of time before they can be cut off.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the construction of the rule is well settled by the practice under the old rule in relation to a morning hour, which prevailed in the House before the Forty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's requests have been objected to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I understand that, Mr. Speaker, and I now ask unanimous consent that Thursday evening of this week be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] asks unanimous consent that on Thursday afternoon next the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m., and that the evening session be set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Labor. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. I object.

PENSIONS FOR MILITIAMEN.

Mr. MORRILL (when the Committee on Invalid Pensions was called). Mr. Speaker, I move to call up a bill (H. R. 4915) in relation to the time for filing pension claims of a certain class.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] asked unanimous consent that an hour to-day be given to the Committee on Labor I objected. I do not know whether he asked for the regular hour or for an additional hour. If it was for an additional hour, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] asked that the hour set apart under the rules should be devoted to business reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BLAND. If the request was merely for an additional hour, I would not object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL].

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DUNN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes as provides that no claim of a State militiaman on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That the claims of all such persons now pending, or which may be hereafter filed, shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the act of July 4, 1864, provided that militiamen wounded or injured while in battle under the command of a United States officer should be placed on the pension-roll the same as enlisted men, but it further provided that they should prove up their claims before the 4th of July, 1867, allowing them but three years. Afterward the act of March, 1873, provided that those claims might be proven up at any time before the 4th day of July, 1874. That law provided not that the claims might be filed at any time before that date, but that they might be proven at any time before that date. That allowed fifteen months for proving those claims. Many claimants were doubtless ignorant of the requirement of the act, and very few had an opportunity to present their claims within the prescribed period. There seems to be no good reason why a man, a member of a State militia, fighting side by side with an enlisted man, under the command of the same United States officer, and wounded or injured in the same battle, should not be allowed a pension on account of his wounds or injuries thus received the same as the enlisted man by whose side he fought; and Congress has invariably taken that view when private bills have been presented. Since the expiration of the limit such bills have been presented at almost every session of Congress, providing for placing on the pension-roll members of the militia who were wounded or injured in battle, and those bills have universally been reported by committees without objection and have received the sanction of the House. The bill under consideration proposes merely to repeal the limitation as to the time of proving up these claims, thus giving the militiaman who was fighting under the orders of a United States officer and was wounded or injured in battle the same privilege in this respect that he would have if he had been an enlisted man. This seems to be just and right.

Mr. LONG. How large a number of pensioners would this change in the law admit?

Mr. MORRILL. In all probability a thousand would cover the whole number—possibly there might be two thousand. The law applies principally to the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Minnesota, and Kansas. In Minnesota it applies to the militiamen who were called out under the orders of the United States Government at the time of the Sioux raid, and it would pension a few of those. The State most affected by the passage of this bill would be Missouri. In that State they had some fifty thousand militiamen called out, and the probability is that a thousand or two were wounded; but many of those called out are doubtless now upon the pension-roll, so that the increase of the roll by the passage of this bill would be very trifling, while it would work an act of justice to a great many individuals who are now deprived of their just rights.

Mr. LONG. Does it apply only to wounded men?

Mr. MORRILL. Only to wounds or injuries in battle, not to disability. Mr. Chairman, several cases of extreme hardship have been brought to my attention owing to my position on the Committee of Invalid Pensions. One case in particular I remember, where the whole force in which a militiaman was serving, under the command of a United States officer, was captured by the rebels, and this man was immediately taken out and shot in retaliation for the shooting of some rebels a few days before. His widow filed her application in 1869 before the expiration of this limit, but did not prove up the case before March 4, 1884, owing, I believe, to her inability to obtain some proof as to the death of her husband's first wife. The result is that she gets no pension from the Pension Office; but she brings her case before Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions very properly granted her application without objection.

I desire to state further that this bill has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Pensions. General Black, the Commissioner, was present when it was considered in the committee, and it received his hearty indorsement. I can see no reason why there should be any objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. When was section 4693 passed?

Mr. MORRILL. The first act on the subject was that of July 4, 1864, which provided that all non-enlisted men who were wounded or received injuries in battle should be pensioned if they were under the command of a United States officer. The limitation fixed by that act expired in 1867. In 1873 the time within which claims of this kind might be proved up was extended for fifteen months.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the necessity now for extending it further?

Mr. MORRILL. For the simple reason that claims of this class are constantly coming before Congress, and we are constantly passing them. Every case of this kind that has come up since I have been a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been passed without question. The passage of this bill would relieve Congress of the necessity of passing special legislation in these cases, and it would be a simple act of justice.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the excuse for these persons not having presented their claims long since?

Mr. MORRILL. The limitation as first fixed was a very short one, three years from the close of the war; and everybody knows that immediately after the war, in the excitement that then prevailed, very few pension claims were presented. The limitation as originally fixed expired July 4, 1867. In March, 1873, there was granted an extension of fifteen months, but in the short time during which that extension operated very few were aware that the law had been passed.

Mr. ROGERS. Has there been any estimate of the number of cases to which this bill will apply?

Mr. MORRILL. The estimate is that the number can not possibly exceed two thousand, and may not exceed five hundred. The bill will be confined in its operation almost entirely to the States of Missouri and Kentucky, though there are a few cases in Kansas and some in Minnesota.

A MEMBER. And West Virginia.

Mr. ROGERS. Is there a written report?

Mr. MORRILL. There is.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to hear that report read.

Mr. MORRILL. I will send a copy to the desk, remarking, however, that it contains no estimate as to the number of cases which the bill will cover.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire whether under this bill the widows of soldiers killed in battle will be entitled to pensions.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir. The bill extends the limit so that persons who were wounded in battle may now come in; and in those cases where wounds were received in battle there is record evidence; it is not a matter of proof outside. Besides this, the widows of persons who were killed in battle can come in. The number added to the pension-roll, if this bill be passed, will be very small; and the passage of the measure is a simple act of justice. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to hear the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be read in the gentleman's time.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the reading of the report, but I desire first to yield ten minutes to my friend from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. ROGERS. I did not understand the gentleman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas retains the floor and yields ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] for the reading of the report.

Mr. ROGERS. I want the floor in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] yield the floor?

Mr. MORRILL. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas, reserving the residue of my time.

Mr. ROGERS. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes, submit the following report:

The bill under consideration proposes to repeal the limitation prescribed against persons not enlisted in the Army of the United States, but who, while serving for the time being as members of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, were disabled in consequence of wounds or injuries received in any engagement with rebels or Indians.

This class of persons was first provided for in section 9 of the act of July 4, 1864, which also made provisions for the widows or dependents of such persons as may have been killed in such temporary service, provided, however, a claim under said section was prosecuted to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1867. No further provisions for militiamen were made until March 3, 1873, when, under the act of that date, the limitation in this class of claims was further extended to July 4, 1874.

Several States of the Union organized their militia forces during the late war to aid the regular forces of the United States in the suppression of the rebellion. Among the States most forward in organization of their militia forces were Kentucky, West Virginia, Kansas, and Missouri, in particular the latter.

Under an agreement entered into between the President of the United States and the governor of the State of Missouri, the latter, under date of July 22, 1862, called into service all arms-bearing citizens of that State. About eighty regiments were organized, and although not constantly in the service, were more or less in the field aiding and assisting the forces of the United States in driving from the State the numerous raiding parties of the confederates, as well as in the protection of Government property, and in particular in the carrying of the mails, which in those days were transported principally by stage.

A large amount of Government stores at Springfield, Mo., for the use of the armies operating in Missouri, Arkansas, and Indian Territory, were saved from capture by the confederate forces under General Marmaduke by the militia of the State, in January, 1863. Shortly thereafter a raid into the State by General Shelby proved unsuccessful by reason of the timely concentration of the militia forces. The services of the enrolled militia during the invasion of the State by General Sterling Price are historical. The gallantry of these troops, as well as of the militia of Kansas, at the battle of the Little Blue, Missouri, in October, 1864, materially aided in the complete rout of the confederate forces.

Not only were the movements of the Missouri militia controlled by the respective department commanders, who, it may be stated, were the respective commanders-in-chief of these forces, under the agreement heretofore referred to, but, with the exception of a month in 1862, were furnished by the General Government with transportation, subsistence, and clothing.

The militia of other States, in particular during the first year of the war, did noble work for the cause of the Union; in fact were in many localities the only protection of the homes and property of those who sympathized with the Union or had joined the regular volunteer forces of the North, and on many occasions were called upon to meet in battle array the much better organized forces of the confederacy.

A serious outbreak of the then powerful tribe of Sioux Indians in Minnesota, in the summer of 1862, threatened destruction of life and property in a section of the country then unprotected by a military force equal to the emergency. The timely organization of the militia of the State, however, soon restored peace and safety to the community affected by this outbreak, not, however, without serious loss of life and other casualties among the ranks of the militia.

A number of State militiamen wounded in battle, as well as widows, &c., of others who lost their lives while in this temporary service, are now upon the pension-roll, because they were apprised of their rights and were able to substantiate the same within the period prescribed by law, while many others, who were injured under like circumstances, or who lost upon the field of battle a husband or father, ignorant of their rights, or unable to satisfy the Pension Office of the merits of their respective claims, are, because of the limitation heretofore referred to, shut out from the help which the Government so liberally bestows upon others of its defenders.

Every session of Congress this committee is called upon to take cognizance of a number of cases of this now barred class of claimants.

The merit of this class of cases is, as a rule, not questioned, and Congress has always granted the relief asked for.

Your committee fail to see the propriety in continuing in force the statute which necessitates special action in each individual case arising out of this service, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have not had time to give this bill the consideration which it merits. It is on its face an innocent bill and one which would seem to be a simple act of justice. But its terms are broad; and to my mind it may have a much more extensive operation than is now contemplated. Every week we have before us for the action of the House numbers of special cases of soldiers asking pensions who were in the Army proper. My judgment is that meritorious cases of the class to which this bill refers had better be acted on in the same way. If we should now, after this long lapse of time, suffer these persons who were not in the regular military service of the United States to obtain pensions through the ordinary channels of the Pension Office, we shall, in my judgment, open a door which will lead to large inroads on the Treasury. This bill seems to me an unsafe measure. I recollect distinctly that in the last Congress there was before the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay a measure similar to this, applying to the State of West Virginia.

We shall have all these States, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas, Maryland, Tennessee, and perhaps others, where border warfare was carried on, among the others my own State of Arkansas, coming here making applications under this bill for the pensions which it provides. I am told the pending measure does include all cases of this sort. It will provide for all cases coming from the western portion of my own State, and portions of States lying around the Indian Territory will also be embraced. The door will be thrown wide open for all kinds of testimony; all sorts of methods will be resorted to for the purpose of proving the identity of these persons with the service.

So long as there was a limitation applied to that class of cases, within that period when the testimony was all fresh, before these persons became scattered throughout the country, and the procurement of evidence became difficult, we could arrive at some measure of justice and some degree of certainty; but now, after the lapse of twenty years, and perhaps more, we are called upon again to throw the door wide open, when perhaps most of the witnesses have disappeared, when the public records to a certain extent may have been impaired and lost, and to reopen this whole business, involving additional force in the Pension Office, causing delay to applications far more meritorious than these, of those too who served during the war in the regular service of the Government.

Mr. PETERS. Is it not a fact that these militia organizations are of record in the States?

Mr. ROGERS. My impression is that such will not be found to be the case in many of the States which are embraced under the provisions of this bill. Particularly will such not be the case in those States where the people were divided among themselves during the war. We had an illustration the other day in the State of Kentucky where the members of the same family were divided, and such was the case pretty generally in all the border States. It was so in Arkansas and perhaps in Tennessee, Missouri, and other States. In some of the States the State government itself was identified with the confederacy and there was no militia organization ever kept up by it operating in harmony with the Federal Army. So that my answer to the question of the gentleman from Kansas is, that while in some there may be found records in the States of such militia organizations, there will be found no record in others. My own State, I suppose, is in the latter attitude.

Mr. PETERS. Is it not a fact that the members of the militia of the State of Arkansas were identified with the militia of the other States, and is it not true that such records will be found either in the State of Missouri or the State of Kansas?

Mr. ROGERS. The very fact that the gentleman from Kansas puts to me an inquiry of that sort is proof he is not prepared to answer it; and I can assure him that I have no knowledge which will enable me to affirm or deny the proposition he states, and, therefore, I am not disposed to vote for the pending bill until after more patient and careful consideration, and when I can tell exactly what will be its effect upon the Government.

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman will allow me I will state I know that in the State of Missouri there was a record kept of all those organizations, and I also know there was such record kept in the State of Kansas.

Mr. ROGERS. That may be all true in reference to the State of Missouri, and it may also be true in reference to the State of Kansas, but the gentleman must recollect that this bill embraces the State of Arkansas, and there is no record of such organizations embracing the persons included in this bill in that State. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I should not have much faith in militia records made up immediately after the close of the civil war. There was not much law in those States at that time, not much order, not much government. Everything was demoralized, and it could not be otherwise. The methods were all loose, unsafe, and uncertain.

Mr. PETERS. I beg leave to add, also, from investigations which I have made in particular cases, that I know there is a militia record in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. ROGERS. That may be true; and still the gentleman does not answer in reference to Arkansas. I find, upon examination of the pension reports, that Arkansas contributed some 7,000 troops to the Federal service. It is not probable that a State which seceded and joined the confederacy would have kept of record a roll of the militia connected at that time with the Union service. It is altogether improbable. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I regard it as almost certain that there has not been preserved in the State of Arkansas any such record of troops contributed to the Federal service as we are told has been preserved in the State of Missouri and in the State of Kansas, and I should not have much faith in it if it had, and I do not have much faith in them.

Now, I am willing to be as liberal as any gentleman ought to be in these matters, but I am not willing to reopen the door to a particular class of cases, and especially at this late day, after the lapse of twenty years, in behalf of those who served a day, or week, or month, until we have definite data and a well-guarded bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if he considers that it is throwing the door wide open to allow pensions to men who were shot down in battle under the command of an officer of the United States Government in the defense of the Union?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, that is not the question presented here at all. These people have had their day in court, and they let it pass by. We had fixed a limitation for these cases. The very object of all statutes of limitation is to fix a time when society shall have rest and repose. The question is, shall we disturb that rest now?

Mr. MORRILL. That is all, Mr. Chairman, that this bill proposes to do, and before any man can get a pension under its provisions he must prove to the satisfaction of the Pension Office that he was in the service of the Government, under the command of a United States officer; and the Pension Office, as I understand it, will accept no proof except the records of the War Department.

Mr. ROGERS. That may be all very true; but does not the gentleman see that you must rely upon all sorts of proof to connect the applicant with the military service of the Government? The officer under whose command he claims to have served may have been dead twenty years. If an order ever was given to enroll him in the military service of the Government, the officer issuing the order or directing the service may be dead, and the whole question left to oral proof.

There may be no record whatever of his presence in connection with any branch of the military service of the Government, and yet you open wide the door to the introduction of any kind of proof to connect him therewith.

Mr. PETERS. All of these records, let me state to the gentleman from Arkansas, are on file in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, and unless the applicant shows by these records that he was in the military service in some State in connection with its militia he would not be entitled to a pension.

Mr. ROGERS. The bill does not make any such distinction. That is a construction of the bill that is given to it by the gentleman from Kansas. It may be or it may not be correct. If it was the desire of the committee to so limit it in its operation they should have incorporated that provision in the bill, or to accomplish the same thing now by an amendment to the bill; but I have yet to hear of any such amendment being offered.

I repeat, so far as my own State is concerned the whole matter is thrown wide open for oral proof. I take it that there is not a particle of evidence in the Adjutant-General's Office which will give any correct roll of the militia of that State during the war. I have no doubt other States are similarly situated. That, Mr. Chairman, is a very certain conclusion from the facts presented. The State was in a condition of rebellion. The government of the State was not identified with the Federal Government at the time, but was identified with the confederate government. It had no officer who could recognize these persons as being identified with the service of the United States.

There is no mode of connecting this service with the service of the Government, except as I have said, by all kinds of irrelevant documents or proofs which may be filed in support of the claim; and if we are, by a bill, to endeavor to do justice, as gentlemen claim, to those States whose military forces were identified with the Government of the United States through the State governments during the war, the same law should be made to embrace those persons who were identified with the military service of the Government during the war but whose State governments were not so identified; and the statement of the gentleman from Kansas, if it be a correct one, that such files are on record in the Adjutant-General's Office, is only an additional reason why no measure of this kind should be made to apply to the States of Kansas, Missouri, or Kentucky which does not apply to my State.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. I wish to ask if the State of Arkansas did not have a military governor, and if the seven thousand men in the service of the United States were not commissioned by the same governor?

Mr. ROGERS. The seven thousand men of whom I speak belonged to the regular Army of the United States; and I do not know of any governor—any military governor—who had his headquarters in Arkansas at that time. I am rather inclined to think that the only governor that would have been safe in that State at that time would have been a military one, and with troops behind him, if he were attempting to command militia in the interest of the Federal Government.

Mr. WADE. I wish then to inform the gentleman from Arkansas that Governor Phelps, of Missouri, was the military governor of the State of Arkansas, appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and that the militia of the State of Arkansas in the Federal Army had their commissions from the governor of Arkansas, and had just as much of an organization as he asks that they should have had.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to know just where the gentleman's headquarters were at that time. I suppose they were somewhat in the position of General Pope's when he issued his famous orders—in the saddle.

These, I think, Mr. Chairman, are serious objections to the consideration of this bill. If we are to open up all of these claims again it should be only by a carefully guarded measure. We do not want now, after the lapse of twenty years, to open up these cases on parol testimony alone which must identify these parties with the service of the Government; and if it is to be done at all let it be by such a measure as will operate equally and uniformly upon all the States. For myself I think it is an exceedingly unsafe measure to pass at this time and in this manner.

I yield now to the gentleman from Texas such time as he may require, reserving the remainder of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EDEN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

PENSIONS TO STATE MILITIAMEN.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have had no opportunity to consider the provisions of this bill; but the facts are these: Under the act of 1873 these claims were to have been presented by the 4th day of July, 1874.

By that a period of nine years from the termination of the war in 1865 was covered. Within that time persons might have understood their rights. And from the time of the passage of the first act in 1873, or earlier, they had till the 4th of July, 1874, to present their claims.

That has rested until now, nearly twelve years, or more than eleven years. And now we are asked to pass a general law that is to let in all persons of the class designated and which contains this as its second section:

That the claims of all such persons now pending, or which may be hereafter filed, shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service.

In the report which was read, so far as I could hear it in the confusion around me, there is no pretense of a statement as to the probable number of persons who will apply for relief under this act. No basis of an estimate is presented. There is no indication made to the House of what it is going to cost the tax-payers of this country if you pass this law.

It appears to me when we propose to pass a law a due reference to prudence requires some effort should be made to ascertain approximately at least how many persons there are who would probably be entitled to pensions under the provisions of such an act and what it is going to cost the Government. One thing, Mr. Chairman, is certain, that after the passage of the arrears-of-pension act a very great number of persons in this country discovered they were entitled to pensions that never knew it before. It was rather a remarkable circumstance. And now if we pass this act I suppose we shall have every man that has had rheumatism in the last twenty years here for a pension if he can show by any means he was on any sort of militia duty during the war. The terms of the act are very broad. I will read the third paragraph of the act of 1873.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADE. I think the gentleman from Texas is a fair-minded man and wants to do just what is right. Now, I desire to state to him that under this law there is no title to a pension unless a man was either killed or wounded in battle.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps I am mistaken. I thought it covered everything. Let us see. This third paragraph of the act of 1873, section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, provides as follows:

Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service.

If it stopped there perhaps the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WADE] is right in his construction of the law. Let us see what is the next sentence:

But no claim of a State militiaman or non-enlisted person on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

This covers wounds or other injuries received in the service.

Mr. MORRILL. In battle.

Mr. REAGAN. The second section of the bill now pending provides—

That the claims of all such persons now pending or which may be hereafter filed shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service.

Was the language here not meant to cover every possible ground of claiming a pension that could be claimed under the existing law pensioning those who were in the service of the United States? If so, then it opens the whole field to every possible disability of those who were temporarily in the service.

Mr. WADE. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. The language of the second section is "all such persons." Does not the second section tell who those people are? There can not possibly be a claim for a pension under that section except in the case of a man who has been wounded or killed in action.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Missouri may be right But from the little thought I have been able to give this bill since it has been called up, for I have had no other opportunity to consider it, it seems to me that taking the act of 1873 and this bill together, especially its second section, the effect is to open the door to every possible character of disability, and to give rights to all claimants for pensions just as if they had served regularly in the Army. And twenty years is a long time for a man to wait to find out he is entitled to a pension from the Government of the United States. There may possibly be individual cases of hardship that from some cause or other may have been overlooked; but if so, Congress has shown its readiness in every case of real merit to give whatever relief is deserved by a person who has been in the service of the United States.

There is no trouble on that score. And if a general bill of this sort is to be passed so long after the service was rendered, and all the ailments which afflict men after the middle of life, extending over this long period of twenty years, are to come in to supplement whatever may have been incurred during the brief period of service, we can very well imagine that the list of pensioners under this bill will be a very large one. I want to say again, Mr. Chairman, what I have said before, that no one is more ready than myself to aid in securing a pension for every man that rightfully deserves a pension for services rendered; but I want also to repeat my protest against the reckless manner in which we are proceeding here to pass pension laws. It is well calculated to alarm the country if it does not do so, and I want to submit the suggestion that this going forward with reckless disregard of facts and circumstances and consequences to pass all sorts of pension laws must come to a reckoning before long, because there are a great many tax-payers in this country who do not go upon the pension-rolls, and every bill that is passed like this multiplies the burdens they have to bear. We have just passed a bill appropriating $75,000,000 for pensions. Some time ago we passed a bill for arrears of pensions which we were told, when it was before us, would not cost over $30,000,000, yet when the Commissioner of Pensions came to make his estimate the winter after the bill passed he showed that it would cost $750,000,000! And here we have before us now another proposition of a very general character. The law which it proposes to amend applies to any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians. That language covers not only those who served under the command of a United States officer, not only those who served in the regular militia, but all persons who under any circumstances volunteered and rendered services.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to ask him a question. That law has been in existence since 1864. The gentleman admits that?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; but limited.

Mr. MORRILL. But is it not a fact that every Commissioner of Pensions during all that period has held that, under the law, no man could get a pension unless he had served under the direct command of a United States officer?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know, sir, what the rulings have been on that point.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the fact. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will so state.

Mr. REAGAN. But when we read this language, we may consider what would be the effect of such a law, what would be the legal ruling upon it—for we have to judge of that for ourselves. This language applies to several different classes. First, it includes "any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State under orders of an officer of the United States." That is one class. "Or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States." That is another class. "Or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians." That is still another class. That includes persons not belonging to any organized force, not required to have any superior authority whatever over them. A handful of "jay-hawkers" might get pensions under that classification—a body of men who got together and went out on a robbing expedition—and our memories are alive to the fact that a great deal of that was done. Voluntary companies of "jay-hawkers" got together and went out, not to make war as civilized nations make war, but to rob and burn and plunder mercilessly the homes of women and children, yet the men who did that can come here and claim pensions under this law for that sort of service. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that a law that is susceptible of such a construction ought not to be passed; especially with the second section of this bill, which provides "that the claims of all such persons now pending or which may be hereafter filed shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service."

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him one question relative to that section of this bill. Would it not give arrears to this class of pensioners?

Mr. REAGAN. I take it for granted that it was intended to give arrears. But, Mr. Chairman, the objections I have already pointed out to this bill seem to me sufficient to prevent its passage. Under it pensions may be given to jay-hawkers, robbers, and murderers, not soldiers. That alone is a sufficient objection. We do not know and can not know, from anything which is stated in the report or upon the floor, how many claimants are to come in under the provisions of this bill or how much money it is to cost the Government. I regret very much that I am not able to discuss this question with as much knowledge as gentlemen who have given more attention to the details of the laws relating to pensions, but I do feel that I ought in every way possible to protest against these extravagant appropriations and provisions for pensions which are made here without any just rule for their allowance.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield as much of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] as he desires.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, when those who legislated contemporaneously with this service passed the act under consideration there must have been some cause for the limitation of time then adopted. It requires no great sagacity on our part now to see what that cause was; and the question for us to determine is whether that cause never existed, or whether, having existed, its force is so diminished as to justify us in repealing the limitation and throwing open this class of cases for all time to come.

What were the reasons for limiting the time within which applications for pensions should be made in these cases? They were the very best. My time will not permit me to state all that could be enumerated; but a sufficient reason to justify the legislators who passed this act lay in the fact that without the limitation these claims would have continued to come in for years when there was no record evidence upon which the Government could rely concerning the claims. What was the nature of the service rendered by these men? They were not regularly enlisted in the service of the United States; they were not presumed to have a regular army record of enlistment; in the nature of things they could not have such a record. And they could not have a hospital record, which the regular soldier possessed when he was wounded or disabled in the line of duty. Hence the wise legislators who framed the act under consideration provided that it should expire by limitation with the reasonable life of the persons who were contemporaneous with the rendering of the service.

If we repeal that limit, what will be the result? These cases will come here not only this year and next year, but for a quarter of a century or possibly half a century. There is, as I have said, no record evidence of enlistment in these cases, because the men were never regularly in the military service of the United States. There is no hospital record, because in many instances the term of actual service of these men was only a day or perhaps an hour. Hence, when you repeal the limitation now in force and fix no limit, you open the door to the admission of that secondary evidence which, while weak under all circumstances, will be doubly weak here.

A MEMBER. If there is no record of these men's service how are they going to prove they are entitled to pensions?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I presume this bill would allow the admission of that secondary evidence which is allowable in other cases where primary evidence is not obtainable; in other words, the facts entitling the party to a pension would be proved, not by men who were in the military service of the United States, but by militiamen who never enlisted in the United States service, who were never willing to "cross the Rubicon" and "burn the bridges behind them," so far as concerned entering the service of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a liberal policy in the granting of pensions. No man is more ready than I am to grant pensions where they are deserved. I am ready to give them, and have participated in giving them as cheerfully as any man here. But the very surest basis of adequate pensions to meritorious pensioners is to maintain every barrier that can possibly be erected for the prevention of fraud and the obtaining of pensions by those who are not entitled to them.

I admit that there is a class of militiamen whose services may deserve pensions; and this legislation as passed eleven or twelve years ago was wise, because it limited the time within which these claims should be presented and prosecuted. The intention was that they should be presented while the comrades of the persons making claim were still alive, while the battles in which they took part were fresh in the memory of the participants. But the legislators who adopted this act, knowing the weakness of the proof upon which the parties must rely, provided that the act should expire by limitation in 1874. Now, shall we open the door which has thus been closed? Can we not better trust to the Pension Committee and to this House, which, whatever may be said of it, is never slow in granting pensions to relieve those special cases that may require relief?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills under this order has expired and the committee will rise.

Mr. ROGERS. I reserve the residue of my time.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DUNN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has forty-eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] so much of my time as he may desire.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill on which I desire at this time to submit a few remarks. The feature of the measure to which I refer is that in regard to the support of Indian schools. I think that the items of appropriation in regard to schools as they appear in this bill are more satisfactory than in the act of the current fiscal year. This feature of this bill involves a measure of policy which requires, it seems to me, careful consideration. I refer to the appropriation of money for the support of Indian schools in sections of the country beyond the reservations, and also the appropriation for the education of the Indian children in institutions of learning in the various States—institutions not established for the express purpose of Indian education.

The whole appropriation made by the present bill for educational purposes outside of appropriations for schools provided for under treaty stipulations is $1,099,415. Of that sum the bill proposes to expend $700,000 under the following clause:

> For the support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for; for the purchase, construction, and repair of school buildings; and for purchase of horses, cattle and sheep, goats, and swine for schools, $700,000.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that in the main this sum of $700,000 is intended to be expended within the limits of the reservations. Yet this is not expressed in exact terms. There seems to be, in fact, no restriction imposed on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to the application of this sum of $700,000 to education as to where it shall be expended. Yet I apprehend that the object of the committee was to designate $700,000 as the sum which should be expended on the reservations in day and industrial boarding schools. After making this specific appropriation for such institutions of education upon the reservations $300,000 is appropriated for the support of Indian children in schools in the States. So I take it this $700,000 is intended to be appropriated for schools within the limits of reservations. That would leave $399,915 to be expended in institutions of learning outside of the reservations and to be expended upon an unequal basis, a less sum than was appropriated for the current fiscal year.

I find for support of pupils at Chilocco industrial school, Chilocco, Ind. T., an appropriation of $34,125; for the support of Indian industrial school at Salem, Oreg., $35,000; for support of Indian pupils at Genoa, Nebr., $29,750; and for the support and education of three hundred and fifty Indian pupils at Lawrence, Kans., $61,250.

Now, the appropriation for these four institutions is made on the basis of $175 per year for the support of each pupil.

Mr. WELLBORN. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WELLBORN. It is not $175 per year for the support of each child at Carlisle. It was reduced to $167 in the last Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will notice that I have omitted Carlisle. For the support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., the appropriation is $80,000; for Hampton, Va., $20,040, and for the Lincoln Institution, Philadelphia, $33,400, upon the basis of $167 per annum for each pupil.

In addition to those sums the amount particularly mentioned of $300,000 for the support of pupils at institutions of learning in the States, $167 for the support of each child, would make in the aggregate with a few other items, the amount of $399,415. There is also an item of $28,000 for the transportation of Indian children to and from the schools.

There are but two points to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. One is as to the day schools provided for by the section of the bill which I have read, and the other in regard to the policy of appropriating money for the transportation of these Indian children from Indian reservations to the centers of civilization and there educating them. Those are the only two subjects to which I propose to speak at this time..

First, as to day schools. I do not know whether the Committee on Indian Affairs have had the necessary time to consider that subject carefully or not, but when the opportunity occurs and the subject is carefully considered I think they will find that the large sums of money we are expending for the support of day schools among the Indians is not productive of satisfactory results. There are day schools on the larger reservations and some upon the smaller reservations in charge of the Government and supported by the Government, while there are in addition a large number supported by the various denominations of Christian people. These schools are perhaps on all the reservations, with the exception of that of the Navajoes and a few of others of the more Southern tribes.

Experience demonstrates it is practically impossible to induce Indian children to attend the day schools in that systematic and regular manner necessary to secure any satisfactory progress. Where the Indians are scattered, as they should be on lands in severalty, where reasonable progress has been made, it is impossible to gather together the necessary number of children to justify a school which will be of any value; neither the desire of the parents to have their children educated nor the influence of the teachers themselves can be depended on to keep the children together. I think everywhere the result is that these schools practically amount to nothing. The number attending is so small, the attendance so irregular, that no progress is made.

That seems to be the judgment of all persons so far as I am informed who have had experience on or an opportunity to investigate the subject. I think, therefore, the Committee on Indian Affairs, after having examined the subject carefully, will reach the conclusion that the day schools under the support of the Government ought to be abandoned, and that the only schools for Indians which can produce any satisfactory result upon the reservations are industrial boarding schools where children are gathered from their homes, from their savage surroundings, and engaged in a regular course of study during ten or eleven months of the current year under the eyes of their teachers at the agencies, where the presence of civilized people will afford them proper supervision and furnish beneficial and civilizing influences.

These industrial boarding schools on the various reservations, as far as I am informed, have produced the most satisfactory results. The attendance has been quite uniform and regular, the children are not too remote from their parents, and fair progress is made. Indeed, sir, even the friends of the Indians would be not only surprised but much gratified at the fair progress that many Indian children in these local industrial boarding schools have made; and I think still more surprised perhaps at the extraordinary interest the parents of the children take, not perhaps in the education of the children but in the children themselves, and the anxiety they feel for their comfort, health, and surroundings, which are manifested in every Indian community.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, and for others which I could mention if I had the time at my disposal, I am of the opinion that the day schools ought not to be perpetuated, and that the whole money appropriated for educational purposes on the reservations should be expended in giving efficiency to the industrial boarding schools.

The other feature, Mr. Chairman, to which I have alluded is a still more interesting and important one, and that is the appropriation of money to establish and support schools in the States away from the reservations and supporting Indian children in educational institutions not under Government control in the States.

Mr. WILLIS. Would it interrupt the gentleman from Indiana to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. If it will not interrupt my friend in the course of his argument I would like to ask, as a matter of information, to have him state to the committee under what power of the Constitution the Federal Government educates the Indians? I ask it, as I have said, for information, as it is a question that is agitated a good deal just now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the education of the Indian children by the Government was in the beginning the result of treaty engagements entered into between the General Government and the tribes.

Mr. WILLIS. But does not the gentleman know that there is a million of dollars expended outside of the obligation of the treaties?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am coming to that in a moment.

In the main the sytem of educating the Indian children has grown up, as I have said, through the treaties made with the Indian tribes. The practice of making treaties with the tribes began at so early a date in the history of the country and has been so uninterrupted in its progress until a comparatively recent date, that the constitutionality of the proceeding or the power of the President of the United States under the Constitution, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to treat with the Indian tribes can not well be called in question, whether it rests upon the power to regulate commerce or not.

In the next place the power is derived from the general control of the Federal Government over its public lands, occupied by the tribes, its original owners, and this is, as to the land itself, a field of unquestioned constitutional power. And also, in the third place, the power of the General Government over the Territories; there the Federal power is also unlimited.

Under these three powers—that is, the power of making treaties with the tribes to educate their children, the power of regulating and controlling the public domain on which these people were located when it was acquired as an incident to the lands, and the power unlimited to legislate touching the Territories of the United States—has grown up, perhaps properly—I think properly—the exercise of this power of providing in some manner for the education and civilization of the Indian children.

When my friend touches on the other question, independent of treaty stipulations, leaving out that power entirely, of educating the Indian children in the States remote from the Territories or from the public lands—when he raises that question, I can only say this on the spur of the moment, not having considered the subject, that these children may be considered as simply removed from the Territories under what might be called an incident to their government, under the power of police regulations over the tribes, and with a view to their education in the interests of the public peace. That seems to me at first blush the only power that the Federal Government would have (if it possesses such power) to establish institutions of learning beyond the limits of the public lands and the Territories for the education of the Indian children. As I understand it, this power is not a direct but an incidental power, and, as I have said, as a police regulation connected with a subject, the public lands and the Territories, over which the Federal Government has complete control.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The Constitution of the United States clearly confers upon the Government the right to make treaties with the Indians?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Now, in that respect under what clause of the Constitution do you go beyond the treaty stipulation in this matter of establishing Indian schools?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just what I am trying to present; that the power of Congress over the subject-matter results from the right of the Federal Government to make treaties with the Indian tribes, from the power of Congress over the public lands, and, incidentally, over the people occupying it, and also its power over the Territories; and that the right and power to remove the Indian children from the territory or the public lands, either without treaty stipulation or in pursuance of treaty, can only be sustained perhaps on the ground of being the exercise of an incidental power growing out of one of the other powers which I have enumerated, and as more in the nature of a power of police regulation, a method of promoting and protecting the peace within the regions of the country, under Federal control exclusively, than upon any other basis.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana this question. I believe it is acknowledged upon all hands that the Army may be employed to keep the Indians upon their reservations and to keep them under proper police regulations. I hardly think that could be derived from the war power; it can only be derived from a general police power. I desire to suggest the question whether or no, if the Army may be employed in this way at the public expense to keep the Indians on their reservations under proper police regulations, if upon the same principle the Indians could not be educated and civilized with a view to the protection of the frontier.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; as an incident to the police power.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Whether it arises under the general-welfare clause or anything else.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not put it upon that ground. I place this power, if it exists, upon the ground that it is a necessary incident to powers clearly conferred by the Constitution upon Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think the gentleman from Indiana did not show distinctly how this power arose under the power of the General Government over the public lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. It extends only to the Indians, to the aboriginal population. The power of the Government to regulate and dispose of the lands would seem to necessarily imply a supervision over that portion of the population which originally occupied those lands. That portion of the population, according to the uniform policy of the Government from the beginning, is to be provided for on a principle entirely different from that which applies to the rest of the population, which have been treated with as distinct nations. They have been considered in connection with the lands acquired. In order to make the lands available you have adopted for the Indians a different policy from that which would be applied to any portion of the white population of the United States. And this power over the subject-matter affected by the Indians, their relation to the Territories and public lands, would seem to have created an incidental power in Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to suggest this question to the gentleman: Does not the Government in the treatment of the original occupant of the public lands go further than simply to expend the proceeds of those lands on his education?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think so. But I think the power of legislation over the public lands and Territories which embrace the public lands is a much clearer solution of this question. But the power of Congress to legislate on the subject-matter anyhow seems vested in the Federal Government from the necessity of the case as necessary incidents to other powers. It has always been so held; so that whether you regard the public domain of the United States as a great body of lands or as divided into Territorial governments, in either event the power of Congress over the subject is complete and the education of the Indian children on the public domain, on the reservations, is incident to the other power. Here is a field, the public domain and Territories, where the power of Congress is exclusive.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. One further question, if it does not interrupt the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does the Government take any Indian children except those who are under some form of tribal government? Or, in other words, does it educate any who are under any form of what we call civil government?

Mr. HOLMAN. Everywhere the Indians are under some form of tribal government.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Not all of them.

Mr. RYAN. I think all of them in some form or other.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are Indians scattered over the States of Michigan and Wisconsin and portions of Indiana and elsewhere, but they still seem to have some tribal relations, although not that direct tribal relation which is found in the Indian country or on the great reservations.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Indiana it seems to me has brought to our attention quite an important matter. As I understand the gentleman he puts the constitutional ground of defense of this appropriation upon three distinct provisions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not distinct, but kindred.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The treaty-making power, the power over the public lands and Territories, and the power to regulate commerce with the Indians.

Mr. HOLMAN. And also the incidental power, the police power, incident to all governments in the execution of other powers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then there is a fourth ground; not exactly constitutional, but growing out of the organization of the Government, what the gentleman calls the police power. Can it be maintained, on any one of these grounds, that the treaty-making power only authorizes the expenditure of the amount of money that is called for by the treaty? I think that is a plain proposition. The second ground is the power of Congress—

To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Indians do not form part of the territory of the United States in the technical governmental sense of Territories. They have not been formed into Territories. Therefore it must come out of the power to sell and regulate the public lands. Now, is there anything in the Constitution to indicate that the power to sell the land gives us power to do anything with the Indian? And is it not expressly prohibited by the provision of the Constitution that Congress shall have power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes.

So that our power to do anything with the Indian tribes is simply to make a treaty with them as with a foreign nation. Or can we under the words "to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes" enter into an educational or charitable system of treating them? It seems to me a matter of importance to call attention to this.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. It does not seem to me that that feature of the power assumed to be conferred upon Congress is specially important. The important power, so far as this subject of expenditure is concerned in its origin and its gradual growth and development, is the treaty-making power. It is to be considered, of course, that as to the scope of treaties the Constitution has not attempted to impose any limitation. Undoubtedly under the long-continued practice of the Government under that provision of the Constitution Congress has the power to treat indefinitely with the tribes for the education of their children.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And, so far as the treaty stipulation goes, that is the origin of the power.

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as that is concerned, there is no trouble. It is quite manifest that this whole system of educating the Indian children has grown out of the treaty-making power; but still it seems to me, without any reference to the question of the relation of these Indians to the lands (inasmuch as all of them, with rare exceptions, occupy lands either retained within Federal jurisdiction in States or within the Territories), that the absolute power of Congress to legislate over them, like its power over the District of Columbia, would involve the power to legislate for the inhabitants in relation to education as well as to all else, so that it would hardly be necessary to invoke the police power for that purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. One question: Does not the difficulty here suggested, and do not the other difficulties suggested, all point to the necessity of a change of policy on the Indian question—the breaking up of the policy heretofore pursued, and the adoption of a policy that will bring the Indians in some sense within the general rule of citizenship of the United States?

Mr. HOLMAN. That question is beyond the range of the discussion that I have entered upon.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the power of the Government over the public lands, and the power of the Government over the Territories is not, it seems to me, the proper place to look for the source of power to provide for the education of the Indians; for the territory upon which they are located is presumably their territory. Of course the right of eminent domain is in the Government, but the territory is theirs. Nor do I think the right to educate the Indians comes out of any general mass of powers. It seems to me that it must rest upon the treaty-making power. If we, under the Constitution, can take the children from the Indian tribes and bring them into the States and educate them, we can take children from one State to another to be educated.

I know there is a doctrine now prevalent that we can do a great deal on that subject of education, but I do not know where the power comes from. I do not see where we would get the power to take children from one State at the expense of the Government and take them in another. But I can understand that the Government may rightly provide for matters of education by treaty stipulations with the Indians. We so far recognize the Indians as independent powers as to make treaties with them, and we may stipulate on this subject in such terms and in such manner as may be incident to the treaty-making power. In that way I see how we can make treaties with the Indians upon this subject. Aside from that, however, as a mere matter of policy, I should say that we ought to educate the Indians in their own country and not transport them to a distance to be educated.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is fair for me to state that under this bill and under all our former legislation all the moneys expended under treaties for the education of the Indian children has been expended within the limits of the reservations. If there is any exception to that rule I do not recall it at this time. All the money appropriated for that purpose, whether expended under treaties with Indians in the Territories or elsewhere, if it was appropriated as the result of treaty stipulations, was expended within the limits of the reservations. I am not aware that any treaty has ever been made by the Government providing for the education of Indian children off of their reservations. I do not believe the Indians could be induced to make any such treaty.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the more we reflect upon this subject the more evident it must appear that this power on the part of the Government, if such a power exists under the Constitution, to remove these Indian children from the Territories and from the reservations to remote points for education must be incident to the power of absolute government over the Territories and over the public lands and the aboriginal population occupying in their own right those lands, and to the police power which is incidental to those general powers. For we have always treated with the Indians for the acquisition of their lands, recognized their original title and their relations to at least a part of the lands acquired.

Upon that foundation it seems to me the practice grew up, and probably it can be from the standpoint of the Constitution sustained upon that ground. That is my view, although I believe that the removal of these children from the reservations was never contemplated in any treaty and is not productive of good to them or to the Indians in any way, but is injurious to the tribes. I believe that that policy should not be continued, but that, on the contrary, the education of these Indian children should be conducted on the reservations in industrial schools under the eye of the tribes.

In my opinion, such schools, with the necessary practical and indispensable instruction in labor, are the most powerful agent for the elevation of the Indians, and perhaps the only agent that can elevate and civilize them. A properly organized and well-conducted industrial school, operating under the eyes of the tribe, where the children are taught how to work, has a more civilizing tendency than any other feature of policy yet adopted by our Government in dealing with the Indians. For the purpose of correcting a misapprehension which I may have created with regard to the day schools, I wish to say this: I have intended in my remarks to refer to the day schools under Government control, not those under private and denominational management.

It is found that where the day schools are under the control of efficient teachers who have their heart in their work, the teacher occupying the relation of parent to the children, and missionary influences are brought around the tribes, these day schools have produced very happy results, especially on the Pacific coast. In many instances in the Northwest such schools have brought about an advanced state of civilization for the Indians, who are now in a condition to assume the exercise of citizenship and to take their lands in severalty, so that the agencies may properly be abolished. But that has not been the general experience up to this time so far as Government day schools are concerned. These successful day schools have been under the influences of different Christian denominations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would ask the gentleman whether the fault is not rather with the administration of the system than with the system itself? Is it not a fact that these day schools have usually fallen into the hands of some dependent or relative of the agent, or some one about the agency who takes charge of the school merely for the sake of the allowance in the way of salary rather than for the purpose of administering to the real wants of the Indians?

Mr. HOLMAN. In some instances that is probably the case, but not in all instances. It is the missionary influence in which the whole tribe are ultimately involved, which, it seems to me, has given those denominational day schools their actual value; and many of them have a very great value. But so far as my own experience extends the day schools under the charge of the Government are not, as I have before said, producing any satisfactory results, and are attended by an inconsiderable number of scholars and only at irregular intervals.

I now come back to the only subject on which I specially desired to address the committee—the expenditure of money outside the limits of the reservations. There is no doubt that the schools at Carlisle, Pa., Lawrence, Kans., Genoa, Nebr., Hampton, Va., and other points in the States, and the movements now in progress to establish industrial boarding schools at Santa Fé, N. Mex., as well as in Colorado and elsewhere, have grown out of a very philanthropic and humane motive; but that motive has not in the whole governed and controlled this movement in its practical operation. It is manifest that this policy can rest upon but one of two ideas. One is that the children shall be taken from their savage homes among the tribes and educated amid civilized surroundings and influences and sent back to their tribes as missionaries of progress and civilization. But experience demonstrates the absolute fallacy of that idea. An extended tour among the Indian tribes, North, Northwest, South, discloses the fact that children returning to their tribes after an absence of two, three, or four years find such a fearful difference, such a chasm between the comforts and refinements of a well organized and conducted school and the savage life to which they are returned, that it produces almost inevitably, especially among the girls, (the effect has been uniform so far as I am informed, except where the pupil continues to be under the eye of the Government) a relapse into barbarism, the more intensified by reason of the very intelligence already acquired.

This I think will be found to be the general experience. There is no sympathy—nothing in common—between the untutored savage and his daughter or son returning from Carlisle or Hampton or the Lincoln Institute. There is no possibility in such cases of any sympathy between the parents and the child; and it is not at all remarkable (the difference being so great and the number of those educated so comparatively small) that the latter go back to the barbarism from which they were originally taken.

Another point, and a matter more to be considered, is that all you can do in regard to the elevation of the Indians is to rescue the children from the barbarism of savage life, educate them, and settle them in the enlightened communities where they are educated, thus saving them at least, and letting the adults of the present generation go. I think, when the fact is considered that in the struggle between the Indian and the white man on an equal footing the Indian inevitably goes down, it is not a wise philanthropy that opens up such a career for those we educate.

This policy of removing the Indian from his tribe, with its surroundings, and attempting to put him at once on the plane of a high civilization can not be successful. Human experience demonstrates it can not be done; and you open a dreary prospect to the boys and girls educated at these schools if you adopt the policy of settling them among a population, no matter how humane, incapable of really sympathizing with them or appreciating the elevation to which you have sought to raise them compared with their former state. In such cases there is a reasonable certainty that sooner or later the educated youth will ultimately seek the land of his tribe and sink back to the level of his kindred. The first experiment of this kind was tried years and years ago in the State of Kentucky under the humane auspices, it is said, of Richard M. Johnson, once Vice-President of the United States.

The assumption that the Indian tribes themselves are incapable of being elevated and humanized is not borne out by experience. Wherever you have found humane people living among the Indians, seeking to educate and Christianize them, the effect is seen in some degree, at least, in a single generation. No person can go to a reservation, especially a small one like the reservation at Yakima, on the eastern spurs of the Cascade Range, where the Indians have been under the influences of the Methodist Church for only a single generation, or among the Flatheads, on the Jocko reservation, Montana, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] remarks, where the work has been under the auspices of the Catholic Church, without seeing what has been illustrated in innumerable other instances, the striking effect of Christian civilizing influences upon the Indians in a single generation.

I will mention one other instance. Upon a small stream entering Puget Sound, the Puyallup River, the Presbyterians on one side of the river have sought to advance the Indians in civilization, and on the other side the Catholics have been engaged in the same work. On either side of that little stream the Indian people, fragments of a number of tribes, have grown civilized, lands have been cleared, forests removed, and comfortable homes built. On either side of the stream is a comfortable church building, on one side a Presbyterian church, on the other side a Catholic church; an Indian Presbyterian preacher in the one and an Indian Catholic priest in the other; and every man and woman there is now appealing to the Government that allotments of land in severalty may be made to them, and their homes, the result of their own labor, secured to them and their children.

Mr. Chairman, the experiences to which I have referred are found exclusively, so far as I am informed, upon small Indian reservations, not upon the great reservations. It is therefore to be presumed that it has been the paternal influence which benevolent Christian people have exercised over these Indians which has elevated the whole tribe. Owing to that paternal influence the education of the children has advanced with a cheering degree of progress. Whatever of progress in the education of Indian children has been brought about has been brought about at these industrial boarding schools upon the reservations. These industrial boarding schools are of especial interest to the Indians themselves, on account of the natural interest they feel in their own children. Whatever may be the vices of savage life, the sentiment of devotion of parents toward their children is striking. It is obvious everywhere. It is not at all uncommon to see an old Indian woman walking many weary miles—50 or 70—to reach the Indian industrial boarding school upon a reservation to satisfy herself that her child is well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire only a few minutes more in which to complete what I have to say.

Mr. PEEL. I will take the floor, and yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Arkansas.

And when that object is accomplished and the Indian woman is satisfied her child is well, she returns in content to her home. The removal of children from the reservation is a severe pang to the parent. Whatever you may think of the untutored savages, nevertheless it is a serious matter to them. The removal of Indian children to remote points in the judgment of some intelligent persons connected with the matter is believed to retard the progress of the Indians and defeat the efforts made for their advancement.

The Indian boarding school necessarily has a farm in connection with it, which is one element in favor of the system and one which will help in securing their advancement. Another element in the same connection is that the lands to be cultivated are the same kind of lands which these boys will be called upon to cultivate when they leave school. It is not like the case of learning to cultivate lands in Pennsylvania or Virginia, but it is learning to cultivate lands which they will cultivate in the future as farms; for, sir, it is mostly through the medium of agriculture they are to advance rather than by the means of mechanical arts. The land, therefore, they are taught to cultivate at an Indian boarding school upon the reservation is the land they are to cultivate in after life. Their instruction there in agriculture is of practical value. Besides that, there are necessarily a great many horses and cattle upon these Indian reservations.

There are on the Pine Ridge agency one hundred and seventy-two yoke of oxen, largely connected with the agency itself, and there are also many horses and mules. These animals have to be cared for, and the Indians can be employed to look after them. All these things have a certain civilizing influence. It impresses these Indian boys with the idea of the benefits and fruits of labor.

There are present all the time six, seven, eight, or nine teachers, industrial and others. There is a civilized community formed at these agencies which is continually growing whether there is a boarding school there or not. These persons form a body supposed to be interested in the Indians, and they form an element of immense power not only upon the Indian pupils attending the industrial schools, but also upon the Indians who may gather there from time to time to see how their children are getting along. I think it is scarcely possible to name an argument in favor of removing Indian children from the Indian reservations at the several agencies, while every one pertaining to the location of Indian children at industrial schools upon the reservations is not only that they are beneficial to the children, but to the whole Indian people and have a great civilizing effect. If you did not have to take a dollar from the Treasury, and Christian people were willing to educate these children at their own cost, I do not think Congress ought to permit it to be done, because, in my judgment, the results of the removal of Indian children from their reservations and teaching them in schools located at remote points would shock those who had caused them the moment they came to their knowledge.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether any of the scholars ever go back to become teachers at these schools?

Mr. HOLMAN. Occasionally they do. There are a number of instances which come to my mind. I remember one who is employed as a teacher in the vicinity of Standing Rock, in the northern portion of Dakota. I remember another instance of a bright Indian, a full blood, in the vicinity of Pine Ridge agency. There are other instances of the same kind. The testimony of the Indian agents is not favorable to the employment of Indian teachers because of the absence of their power to control the children, which is the great cause of complaint.

But the larger number of Indian children who have gone back to the reservations from the schools of the States have not been employed by the Government and can not be employed by it. They have been employed as far as could be as interpreters, some as teachers, and in other capacities; some as members of the police force; but, as I have said, the greater number have not been and can not be so employed, there being no employment for them.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether in his opinion it is not desirable that a certain number of Indians should receive, elsewhere than on the reservations, an education of a higher order than can be given to them at those local schools?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad the gentleman has called attention to that point. The practice of the five civilized nations, I think, indicates the wisdom of that policy. They send off to other schools outside of the Indian Territory every year a given number of children, I believe some thirty-five of the brightest and best scholars. And it seems that this is a very desirable policy.

Here and there, not often, but here and there you find a boy or a girl who desires and is capable of having a higher grade of education than can be obtained at the agency, because the range of education is not and ought not to be very extended there.

Whatever the Indian children learn that has not some connection with labor amounts to but very little. The learning to read and write, arithmetic and geography, which they learn very rapidly, surprisingly so, indeed, the ordinary elements of a common-school education, but coupled with constant instruction in labor-acquiring habits of industry, is the power that must elevate these people.

Here and there, as I have said, a boy or a girl is found showing a proper appreciation and peculiar fitness for advanced studies, who may be sent elsewhere for the benefit of the tribe; and, speaking for myself, I think it to be the part of wisdom to continue a single institution of learning—a single one outside of the limits of the reservations—if this policy is to be continued, and I presume it is, where the brightest boys and girls might receive a higher order of education; not many, but the brightest; for not many would be sent if their selection was left to the teachers who are capable of determining their capacity and fitness.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not true that upon the most careful inquiry which he has been able to make, and from extensive travel among the Indians, that without exception the Indian children educated at Carlisle, Hampton, and elsewhere, off the reservations, who were not given employment by the Government, at a very early period lapsed into barbarism; and if it is not true that their condition was frequently worse than if they had not been educated at all?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; that, I think, is to be answered in the affirmative. It may be stated further that those who are familiar with the Indian subject, and who have lived with them, missionaries, agents, and teachers, and especially those military men who have been long stationed among the Indian tribes, but are now identified with them, all, without exception, express the opinion that unless the Government gives to the Indian girl or boy employment—in other words, unless they are supported by the Government, they relapse into barbarism when they return to the tribe; while the Indians educated on the reservation, going home once a year, seeing the old father and mother now and then, keep up their relations with the tribes and are not shocked by a return from civilization to the scenes by which they are necessarily surrounded, but are accustomed to the ways of the tribe and their habits; that such as keep up their relations with their tribes are not so influenced. I think there is little difference of opinion upon that point.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to ask if these industrial schools have educated boys in the use of machinery and how to run it, and, if so, have any of them been occupied tending steam-mills or running locomotives?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that can be answered in some degree in the affirmative.

Mr. RYAN. They have illustrated their capacity.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; there are instances where they are employed in saw and grist mills at the agencies in running machinery, but generally there is the supervision of a white man.

Mr. BUCK. I understood the gentlemen from Indiana, if he will permit an interruption, to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCK. Do I understand the gentleman to say that all the Indian children educated at Carlisle, or most of those that leave it, lapse back into barbarism when they return to the tribe—a barbarism worse than before?

Mr. HOLMAN. That was not exactly the form of the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUCK. I understood the gentleman to ask if these children did not lapse back into a worse state of barbarism than before.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand the question as being confined to all the children, but to certain of them who had not been employed by the Government. However, the gentleman himself made that exception, I believe. But besides that, the question of the gentleman from Illinois would not embrace all of the Indians. It embraces the Indians who went from the school to the great Sioux reservation or to the Crow reservation or to the reservations in the Northwest and to certain sections of the country; but it can not be said properly to apply to all of the reservations without exception. But to the extent of my own observation, and from information that I have had from others in the course of an investigation of the subject, I believe that unless the Indians happen to be employed under the Government as interpreters, teachers, or in some other capacity they are very apt to revert, upon their return to the tribe, to the condition in which the tribe itself may be.

Mr. DORSEY. Does not that apply to the blanket Indians, not to Indians who have built houses and have acquired some of the civilization we are trying to teach them?

Mr. HOLMAN. As a general thing even among the blanket Indians there are houses, very unpretending frame or log buildings, I admit. I suppose there must be a thousand houses in a single agency among the Sioux Indians. Under the encouragement of the Government they build a large number of houses and assist in a great deal of the work themselves. The Government furnishes the doors and windows; the Indians haul the logs, &c., and assist in building the houses.

Mr. LONG. In that work have not some of the boys educated at the East assisted?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not say as to that, because no instance of that kind came under our observation.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman stated some time ago the reluctance with which the Indian parents parted with their children. Is it not the policy and direction of the Indian Department to take no Indian child from its parents without their consent; that in every instance there shall be the free consent of the parents before the child can be taken from them?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the instruction of the Department; but it is not the practice. And when my friend comes to examine the testimony he will find that that rule has very naturally been constantly violated.

Mr. STORM. By whom?

Mr. HOLMAN. By any number of persons. My friend must remember that these children are gathered up——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that these children are kidnaped so as to be brought into the schools?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman from Indiana seems to hint that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not hint it. I say they do not go to school willingly. The agents are sent into that region of country. The agent understands the policy of the Government is to fill up these schools; and any person who has spent a single day in an agency knows the power of the agency if there are annuity goods or rations to be issued. I think the testimony shows the parents do not consent.

Mr. STORM. Then the law is violated.

Mr. HOLMAN. The parent reluctantly allows the child to go to school on the reservation.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to show with what reluctance he does so. At Standing Rock, the gentleman will recollect, the testimony of the agent was that he said to the Indians, "I will withhold your rations unless you furnish so many children to go to school on the reservation;" not to go off, not to go to the Carlisle school, but to go to school on the reservation. And then the heads of bands ransack the bands from center to circumference and gather up the helpless, the dependent, the orphan children, to bring in, because it was so disagreeable to the parents to part with their own children.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion just there?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I notice that most if not all of the appropriations for these Indian schools are gross sums; but they seem to be measured by the number of Indian pupils.

Mr. HOLMAN. That applies to the schools in the States.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now is it found in practice that this is a temptation to make children go to these schools unwillingly; because the schools do not get the whole amount appropriated but only the amount of the individual appropriation multiplied by the number of pupils?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not answer that question; but I suppose not. I take it for granted the humane people, the Christian men and women who interest themselves in these institutions throughout the country, have no possible motive but the benefit of the Indian.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How do they get the pupils at these schools?

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted they send their agents out. The committee found an agent at Pine Ridge who had been there for a long time gathering children for the Lincoln Institution.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Do those children go willingly?

Mr. HOLMAN. The agent says they do not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then practically the agent has some means of getting unwilling children, or whose parents were unwilling, and bringing them to these institutions to be educated.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is really no great trouble about it. The agent is all-powerful. If he says to an Indian family or to a band of Indians, "Your rations are to be withheld until a given number of children are brought in," for the time being children are brought in, perhaps reluctantly, but they are brought in.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is to say the children are not kidnaped, but the rations of the parents will be either limited or stricken off if the children are not brought in.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is proper for me to say that that applied to getting the children to industrial schools on the reservations.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Another question.

Mr. PERKINS. I think I must insist on some limit to this general discussion. If these interruptions are to be allowed there is no knowing when the gentleman from Indiana will get through.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will be through in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much further time does the gentleman from Indiana ask?

Mr. HOLMAN. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unamimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Has the education of the Indians at these various places demonstrated the capacity of the Indians for ordinary Anglo-Saxon civilization and its life?

Mr. RYAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think so. I think there are a great many Indians now on the smaller reservations who are perfectly able to take care of themselves. I think you might name a very considerable list of reservations where the agencies ought to be abolished and the lands assigned to the Indians in severalty.

When an Indian gets so advanced that he understands the value of property and the benefit of labor you can safely give him his land. He will settle down upon it and make progress year after year. There are many of the smaller tribes and combinations of fractions of tribes where the Indian is in a condition to assume the rights of citizenship to as great an extent as any of the Indians of Michigan or Northern Indiana. They are able to manage a farm, and to manage it with discretion, and to manage their affairs generally. I would not say that it would be wise to place the titles to the lands entirely under their control, because I think that a long time must elapse, possibly generations, before the Indian can hold his own against the white man.

For that reason I think the title to the lands should be suspended indefinitely until a time is reached when legislation upon that subject can be entered upon with full knowledge of all the facts and the best means of judging what can be safely done. But that the Indian is capable of improvement, capable of mastering the ordinary elements of an English education, capable of learning to work and of understanding the value and importance of labor, has been demonstrated over a very wide field.

Mr. STORM. Will the Indian learn to appreciate those things until he is given his lands in severalty?

Mr. HOLMAN. You may grant lands to the Indians in severalty, but unless they are capable of understanding the nature of the grant, capable of appreciating the idea of separate individual property, the mere assignment of the lands will amount to nothing. We placed a body of Indians down among the Pottawatomies years ago and marked off lands for them; but they left those lands and went up among the Kickapoos. They made very fair progress there; but, with a superstition that is perhaps common to savage life everywhere, they did not even visit again the part of the country from which they departed when they left the lands which had been assigned to them.

Mr. RYAN. Do you think that would have been the case if they had been given lands to which they were attached?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not say as to that. The Indian is known to have strong local attachments. I think, however, that he must be given time to make some further progress before you can safely give him control of the title of his lands. He must have some further experience of the benefits and advantages of individual industry and individual property. I think, however, as I have said, that a large body of the Indians have already reached a point where lands ought to be assigned to them in severalty.

Mr. STORM. Is not three hundred years a pretty long period in which to learn those things?

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been only within a few years past that the Government has made any effort to advance the interests of these Indian tribes. Only within a few years past has the Government brought within their reach the means of learning by experience the benefits of industry. Whatever had been done during almost the whole of the period to which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] refers was merely the limited work of Christian people.

Mr. LONG. Do you not think that a large part of the improvement and the increased civilization of which you speak has come not directly from the boys and girls educated in these Indian schools at the East, but from the fact that there has been a public sentiment which has found expression through those schools? In other words, has there not been a general influence emanating from the schools in the East which has reacted on the public opinion of the West and resulted in that improvement and advance in civilization?

Mr. HOLMAN. As to that, take such a school as the one which exists among the Flathead Indians; that school has an influence which is felt over a very wide area; tends to elevate to a certain extent all the surrounding people. It should be remembered that the Indian parents understand that they give up their children to the agent. The idea of sending them off to school does not enter into their minds; the idea is that they give them up to the agent. It is easy to see how such institutions as have been established and supported among the Sac and Fox Indians, industrial schools right in the midst of the tribes, are to be credited with a large proportion of the good work done.

Mr. LONG. I agree to that; only it occurs to me that those schools are to some extent the result of the sentiment which established the schools at the East.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, if you visit those Western tribes you will find that the Indians at some of the schools there made good progress long before the Eastern schools were established.

Mr. MCADOO. What is the value to the Indians of those large reservations which are devoid of game and which they do not cultivate?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no game any more. My time has expired or I would answer the question more fully.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire only at this time to examine hurriedly some of the provisions of the pending bill, and to notice somewhat hurriedly some of the criticisms that have been made upon it. It was observed on yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] that this bill was reported much in the old groove or rut of former Indian appropriation bills. It is, perhaps, a sufficient answer to that criticism to say that, under the rules of the House, it could not be otherwise, whatever might have been the views or the disposition of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The power to incorporate into this appropriation bill new legislation has been taken from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and whatever we as members of that committee may have thought of the necessity of some new departure, we were restricted under the rules of the House to consider the propositions that were submitted and providing for the expenditures authorized by law. We found, however, in considering this bill, that the system which had grown up under the supervision of the able gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the able gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], as well as of the other members of the Committee on Appropriations, was a system that was resulting in great good, and it may be doubted whether with propriety or with good to the country we can depart far from it now.

Criticism is made of the appropriations found in this bill for educational purposes. I might say briefly that the disposition of the committee was to strengthen the educational and Christianizing agencies of the Government at work for the good of the Indian, to add to them if necessary by increased appropriations, and to lessen and cut down expenditures in other particulars. That is to say, we have sought to do that which was calculated to make the Indian self-sustaining and independent of the Government, to cultivate his individuality, to advance his educational and moral interests, hoping that in the end the necessity for this annual appropriation might cease to exist.

As has been suggested, there is found in this bill an appropriation of $1,099,000 for educational purposes. Some of this expenditure is made necessary in fulfilling treaty obligations, but much of it is independent of treaty stipulations. The right to make this appropriation—the constitutional authority of Congress to provide for the education of this class—has been questioned. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suggested in reply where he found constitutional authority for this appropriation; and I think he might have suggested further that it is found in the "general welfare clause" of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

We find these people among us, occupying reservations set apart for their habitation. We find them in a nomadic, blanketed condition. We believe the public good demands that, as rapidly as may be, these reservations should be broken up; that these tribal organizations should cease to exist; that the "commune" shall be destroyed, and the dignity and protection of the American citizen extended to this people. To do this they must be educated; to do this they must be enlightened; to do this they must be Christianized; and it was the feeling and desire of our committee, as it has been the feeling and desire of the Appropriations Committee heretofore, to strengthen those agencies which are likely to accomplish this result. I think the constitutional authority is clearly expressed in the clause which I have just cited.

When we remember that the first appropriation for this purpose was made only ten years ago, when the insignificant sum of $20,000 was appropriated, is it remarkable that we can not find in these reservations and scattered throughout the country the cultivated, educated Indian that we would like to see or that some gentlemen would expect? This system of education is of recent growth. It is fostered and encouraged by the country; and I believe that the experiment—because I am willing to concede the work is largely experimental—justifies the appropriations we have made for this purpose and the appropriation now reported for the consideration of this House.

Criticism is made of the schools in Pennsylvania, in Kansas, in Nebraska, and other Indian industrial schools; yet in my judgment no school can be found throughout this land, whether upon an Indian reservation or elsewhere, which in the same period has been doing better and more efficient work or which has accomplished more substantial results than the school at Carlisle, Pa.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? I admit that at Carlisle and other schools which have been referred to the children while in the schools make magnificent progress in education; but I do say that without exception, when they return to the tribes where they must live, if the sustaining influence of the Government is withdrawn, they drop back at once into the savage condition; they are compelled to succumb to the sentiments of the tribe, the evil influences of which they absorb, instead of retaining the good that they have received at Carlisle or elsewhere; so that their condition is worse than if they had never been taken from the reservation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Why worse?

Mr. PERKINS. I understand the argument made against these Indian schools to be as indicated by the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and I admit there is some force in it; but I think the apparent foundation for the argument results largely from the fact that this is a new departure; that these industrial schools are of recent creation; that the scholars who have been taken from these Indian reservations return there when educated without the necessary moral support to sustain them or to enable them to break down the ignorance and superstition that surrounds them.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me one further remark?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The case being, as the gentleman just states, then, instead of sending ten or twelve hundred children now in these schools back into the tribes to lapse into barbarism, as they are sure to do, would it not be wise and humane to make further appropriations for giving them a start this side of the Mississippi River, among the white people, keeping them away from the tribes, thus preserving at least those that we educate?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this bill that prevents such a policy. There is nothing in this bill that compels the return of these Indians when educated to their reservations. There is nothing which deprives them of the right of becoming citizens of the United States and discharging the responsibilities of such.

But in that connection I was about to make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman: Take one Indian child from the Sioux reservation in Dakota, one from the Winnebagoes in Minnesota or Wisconsin, one from the Kiowa agency in the Indian Territory, one from the Navajoes in New Mexico, and so from reservations scattered throughout the country, educate them at Carlisle, and when educated return them to their reservations; and then, as suggested, the ignorance and superstition which surrounds them works their demoralization and deterioration. But when we have these schools at Carlisle, at Lawrence, at Hampton, and other places working together, educating not one from a single reservation but half a dozen or a dozen from each, and adding to the number each year, then these pupils when returned to their homes will be capable very greatly of defending themselves from the demoralizing effect of their surroundings. They will form an element and influence that will be capable of resisting the evil tendencies of which the gentleman from Illinois has spoken, and will become an educating force for the good of others. Thus we shall find that in the end something more will be accomplished than the education of the individual; and this, I think, is what the experiment will lead to. It has been suggested that we should have reservation industrial schools. I challenge gentlemen to point to a reservation industrial school in the country that has accomplished more or is accomplishing more either for the scholars or for the Indians generally than these industrial schools of which I have made mention. The very objection that is urged against the day schools attaches very greatly to the reservation industrial school; the surrounding influences are such as very greatly to impair its usefulness and power.

But I think the criticism upon the day school is well founded. That is the feeling of this committee. The committee does not propose to appropriate by this bill a dollar to give encouragement to the extension of that system, but simply proposes to carry on those schools that are to-day organized and in existence, and until better advantages are secured. I can say to this House that the disposition of the superintendent of Indian education, as well as of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is not to encourage these day schools, but to encourage and build up as rapidly as possible these industrial schools, where more than reading and writing is taught. And we have given by the provisions of this bill discretion to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. While I differ with him politically, I have confidence in his integrity. I believe he desires that which is only good for these Indians and for the Government, and I think it is but right that the power which is charged with this duty should be given some discretion.

The last Congress appropriated $595,000 for this purpose. We have increased it somewhat, and have reported $700,000. This $700,000 is to be expended in the manner suggested, but the feeling of the committee was and the feeling of the department is that these day schools are accomplishing but little good, but that these industrial schools, at which they are not only taught to read and write, but at which they are taught to farm and to make wagons and the various implements of industry and usefulness, are accomplishing a great work. If any member of this committee would visit the school at Carlisle, under the superintendence of Captain Pratt, or the school at Hampton, under the superintendence of General Armstrong, or the school at Lawrence, in my own State, under the superintendence of Count Grabowski, he would be satisfied these industrial schools are accomplishing a wonderful work in Indian education and progress. Children come there in the blanket condition, without the capacity to speak or understand a word of the English language, and yet at the end of five months they will stand up at the wall and read in good English and write in good chirography words given to them by their instructors. And at Carlisle we find this practice engaged in, which, to my mind, is a praiseworthy one.

After these Indian pupils have been educated for a time and have made sufficient progress they are hired out to the farmers of Pennsylvania, where they may get in addition a practical knowledge of farming. In addition to the scientific knowledge which they acquire of literature and of agriculture, they in this way secure an actual knowledge of farming and business by daily association with the white farmers and American citizens by whom they are surrounded, and with whom and for whom they work in the fields. Captain Pratt engages them to the farmers of Pennsylvania, and the earnings which they make by their labor they get themselves, and these earnings they use for their further improvement. It all serves to make them better citizens, and, as I have already suggested, in my judgment this system when continued and carried on for a series of years, so that we may be able to find the practical effect and benefits of it, will meet with universal approval, and there will be no effort in this House to strike down these industrial schools.

It may be possible, Mr. Chairman, if the question were here to be decided for the first time, these Indian boarding schools might be located nearer these Indians; that is the one at Hampton, the one at Carlisle, and the Lincoln School in Philadelphia. But the Committee on Indian Affairs found these schools in operation; it found them organized and at work, and the question was whether they should be continued or stricken down. Every report which came to us was favorable, and every voice we heard asked that they might be continued. Every importunity was that these schools might be protected and that their usefulness might not be impaired. I believe the results are satisfactory to the people of the country generally, as they are to those who have given the matter special investigation or thought.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly of the progress made by the civilized tribes in the Indian Territory. Their accomplishments and achievements demonstrate to this House what the Indian is capable of when civilized and educated. There we find courts organized, there we find schools conducted, and there we find scholars from Carlisle, these young Indians from Hampton, Lawrence, Chilocco, and Lincoln, engaged in good work, instructing in the schools and contributing to the growth and moral improvement of that people. We find churches there, and we find legislative bodies, and as I sat a few months ago in the legislative chamber of the Cherokee Indians at the capital of their Territory and saw them conduct business and witnessed their methods, it seemed to me that at times at least they might teach lessons of propriety and decorum to this House. If these five tribes have been capable of this growth and this development, if the proper system is adopted, if the proper method be employed, the same result no doubt can be secured for the others.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Will the gentleman let me ask him to state under what auspices these Indians have made their progress?

Mr. PERKINS. I consent that they did not make this under the auspices of the Government of the United States, or in consequence of appropriations made for them. But my observation is that the Indians generally are making progress to-day in consequence of this new departure on the part of the Government, in consequence of this system inaugurated by the American Congress; and that the system has promoted a more rapid increase in their progress than has ever been witnessed before in the history of this Government. Mr. Chairman, the progress of the Indians to-day is more rapid under this system of education than under the missionary efforts of the various churches of this country. You may go among the Indian tribes of the Pacific coast or of the Rocky Mountain ranges and investigate the condition of these people where the missionaries have been making efforts for years, and the progress they have made is insignificant when compared with the progress of to-day through these efforts and appropriations of the Government.

Now I desire to say that in consequence of the progress made by the civilized tribes not a dollar is appropriated in this bill for their benefit except to carry out treaty stipulations and to provide for one agent at the Union agency in the Territory. They are capable of managing their own affairs, and not a dollar is given by the Government for their education.

They do sustain themselves, and are able to promote their own common interests; and, Mr. Chairman, to-day the proposition is submitted to the American Congress whether it shall be a war of extermination or whether it shall be that better efforts be made to educate and civilize them. We must do one of two things—either exterminate the Indian tribes, drive them to the shores of the Pacific Ocean and into it, or educate them and qualify them for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.

If we would educate them and qualify them for the duties of citizenship we must make these appropriations for that purpose. We must send teachers among them and instructors to qualify them for these duties. We must send to them farmers, men calculated to teach them the industrial arts and sciences; and let me say that that is the policy of our committee, and for the purpose of accomplishing these things the appropriations are made by this bill.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest for the benefit of this committee that during the year 1884, according to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, only one white man in all of this land of ours was killed by an Indian. Such is the progress they are making; such to-day is the condition of the Indians of this country that now we scarcely hear of an Indian outbreak or of an Indian depredation, and it is, in my judgment, greatly on account of the better and more liberal policy the Government has inaugurated concerning their treatment, and in dollars and cents it is cheaper than to pursue them with soldiers, or to fight them with cannon and bayonets.

There are about 265,000 Indians in this country. It is estimated that they occupy, or have possession of, 132,000,000 acres of land. This is very generally circumscribed by defined boundaries, marking them on the map as Indian reservations. This gives to each Indian about 550 acres of land.

It gives to the man and to the wife 1,100 acres of land and to the man and wife and four children about 3,300 acres. This the Committee on Indian Affairs believe to be too much. These reservations, we believe, as rapidly as we can educate the Indians and develop their individuality and strengthen them for the duties of life, may be cut down.

These boundaries may be contracted; the great tracts of land thus circumscribed may be broken up and the lands allotted to the Indians in severalty; and in accomplishing that we not only contribute to the moral and mental development of the Indians, but we open up these lands to development and occupation by the white people of the country. That is the feeling of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and we have already reported some bills looking to this consummation and more will be reported. It is the feeling of the committee that the tribal organizations shall be broken up as rapidly as possible. It is the feeling of the committee that the reservations shall not stand in the way of the march of commerce and progress.

It is the belief of the committee that the commune should be destroyed, and the right to the lands given to the Indians in severalty; and it is in the development of that policy, which I believe should be the policy of this House, and for which these appropriations are proposed, which is to bring about the more rapid advancement and progress of the Indians. On to-morrow, perhaps, a bill will be reported from this committee which proposes in part at least to break up the great Sioux reservation in Dakota, a reservation with 22,000,000 acres of land occupied by about twenty-seven thousand Indians, which gives to each man, woman and child on that reservation more than 815 acres of land.

The conviction of the committee is that this is more land than these Indians should have for reservation purposes. The feeling of the committee is that it should not stand there as a barrier to commerce, progress, and civilization. The feeling of the committee is that some portion of that great reservation may be opened up to white settlement, and the homeless of our country invited to go and occupy it, paying to the Government only 50 cents an acre therefor. Then that which will remain, some 13,000,000 of acres according to the provisions of the bill, may be divided in severalty among these Sioux Indians.

The feeling of this committee is, Mr. Chairman, that we should take from the Indians the scalping-knife and give them the pruning-hook. The buffalo and antelope have gradually disappeared and in their stead must come sheep and cattle. The desire of this committee is that the "sun-dance" shall be stricken down, and that in its stead we shall have industrial schools; that the commune shall give way to the dignity and rights of American citizens; that the heathen idols shall give place to the Christian altars, and the tribal organization broken up, and the individuality of the Indian encouraged and developed, and the lands unnecessarily reserved for them opened to the pioneer, that intelligence and thrift may find lodgment there. And it is in keeping with that policy that these appropriations are recommended which have been suggested as extravagant.

It has been suggested in criticism of this bill that perhaps it would be better to return to that old system which was practiced by the Government for many years—dealing with this question through the War Department; and it has been suggested that these Indian agents that are provided for by this bill should be dispensed with and officers of the Army detailed to perform this service. What might be the practical effects on the practical workings of such a system at this time of course none of us can say positively, because it is a matter of conjecture. But we remember there was a long period in the history of this country when Indian affairs were managed and conducted through the War Department; and because of the irregularities growing up under that system, because of the tyrannies practiced, because of the wrongs consummated, because it was not satisfactory to the American people, the control of Indian affairs was taken from that Department and a Commissioner of Indian Affairs created by law.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Is it not a fact that during all the time the Indians were under the War Department there was not a single military officer acting as an agent? Were not all the agents civil officers?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Let me suggest another point. Does the gentleman not know to-day that the Indian Department has had to ask aid of two officers of the Army to act as agents at places where the civil agents could not get along with the Indians? Is it not a fact that military officers have been detailed at the Cheyenne and Arapaho agencies and at the San Carlos agency in Arizona?

Mr. PERKINS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, the officer acting at the Chyenne agency in the Indian Territory since the resignation of Colonel Dyer is doing the work reasonably well and satisfactorily. But I do not concede he is doing it better, nor do I believe it will be done more satisfactorily in the end than it might be done by many others who might be appointed to do the work from civil life. He was appointed there under peculiar circumstances. There was an outbreak threatened by those Indians. It was necessary that a military force should be sent there to restrain them and to threaten them if they broke beyond the boundaries of their reservation; and it was quite proper that an army officer should be sent there temporarily, at least to perform the functions of an agent under such circumstances. But yet I do not concede, and I think that we have nothing in the history of these Departments that would justify any one in saying, that the War Department would manage this business better than it is managed to-day under the supervision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

On yesterday the appropriations made by this bill for the Indians at that agency were criticised; at least the provisions with reference to them were brought to the attention of the House. There is by treaty a small fund due to these Indians, about $87,000 is due to them under treaty stipulations for educational purposes and for their subsistence and support. There are 6,660 of these Indians at the two agencies—they have been concentrated upon that reservation in the Indian Territory. They are blanketed Indians; they have not been educated; they have not been civilized; they have not been Christianized or taught to work. They have been put upon that reservation, and are circumscribed and confined to its boundaries, and the employés mentioned by the gentleman on yesterday are there to restrain them, to educate them, and to Christianize them.

We have agreed by treaty there shall be annually expended for them $86,500. This gives per capita $13. What progress could be made in their education, what progress could be made in their Christianization, what progress could be made for their good if we should appropriate for them but $13 per capita under such circumstances? It is to promote their interests, as I have suggested in my general remarks; it is to qualify them for the duties of citizenship that we have recommended this appropriation that was criticised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] on yesterday. I think the gentleman enumerated the employés correctly. But they are to assist them, as I before suggested, and to teach them to farm, and to assist them in breaking up the ground for cultivation; and I may add in this connection that this year the Commissioner of Indian Affairs contemplates breaking up 6,000 acres of land on that reservation for the good of these people, and to educate them, and to teach them the arts of agriculture.

We have not, Mr. Chairman, appropriated by this bill a dollar that we did not believe was for the good of the country, as well as for the good of the Indians, for whom the appropriation is made. Mistakes may have occurred, yet, as I suggested a few minutes ago, the feeling of this committee and its policy is to make them self-sustaining as rapidly as possible. And where we could cut down a dollar from the appropriations heretofore made, that simply went to their subsistence, we cut it down; and this bill is $274,000 less than the bill passed at the last Congress. Some of that reduction results from treaty stipulations having ceased.

Other reductions have been made in keeping with the policy that I have suggested, that where we can take from them appropriations that simply go to their subsistence they should be taken; that they should be made to understand that they have to work; that they should be made to understand that they must qualify themselves for the duties of citizenship as rapidly as possible, and that they must become self-sustaining. The feeling of our committee is that these appropriations shall not continue for all time; and it is to teach these Indians that from year to year these appropriations will be lessened, these annuities or disbursements pared down, until the time will come when there will be no appropriations made for them except it be to carry out treaty stipulations and perhaps to contribute to their education.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that, in brief, is the bill of this committee. As suggested in my opening remarks, under the rules of this House we can not incorporate new legislation in an appropriation bill. We must necessarily observe the established rules, we must necessarily follow the precedents. But we prepared this bill with care; we consulted those agencies from which we thought we could get useful information—information that would aid us in framing a bill that would be satisfactory to this House as well as satisfactory to the country when considered and acted upon here.

In conclusion, I trust that this House, when it comes to consider this bill by paragraphs, will not believe it to be good policy or wise legislation to strike down these industrial schools that have been established in this land. If the question here was as to whether the school at Carlisle should be located there or somewhere nearer the Indian Territory, there would be room, perhaps, for gentlemen to suggest that it might with propriety be located nearer the Indians than where it is now established, and money saved in transportation. But that is not the proposition; that is not the question that is presented here. The question is whether this school, which has accomplished so much, shall be sustained; whether the school at Hampton shall be continued; whether the school at Lawrence and the Lincoln school in Philadelphia, and others that I might mention, shall be sustained and their usefulness continued, or whether we shall cripple them and impair their power of doing good.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield fifteen minutes of that time to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity, while we are discussing this appropriation bill, to ask the attention of the committee for just a few moments to some considerations bearing especially upon this question of Indian education. I premise what I have to say with the remark that the Indian problem is a problem which presses for immediate solution. It is one of those problems which, by the very nature of the case, can not wait. A few years ago the Indians had a vast domain. From the Missouri westward to the Pacific it was theirs; the Great American Desert, so called; the mountain slope beyond; the Pacific coast from Texas to the British dominions, were theirs. But already that vast domain is gone. It is cut up with railroads; new Territories have been organized; new States have come into being; civilization is advancing; settlement is pressing them upon every side, until now, except these Indian reservations, there is no Indian country.

The great demand for the public land, the comparative exhaustion of the public domain, the tendency of the white man to go upon the Indian reservations, as evidenced by what is known as the Oklahoma boom, and the taking up of the Crow Creek reservation—all these things admonish us that the day of the wild Indian is past. It is gone, and it can never return. Civilization, like the atmosphere, is pressing upon them on every side. The Indian question must be solved for weal or for woe, and it must be solved within the next twenty years—in fact, it must be solved at once.

The question now is, what are we going to do with the Indian? The day of the war-path is over. There are no longer any possibilities of Indian tribes pursuing the war-path. These railroads that have permeated their country, the immediate presence of the Army upon all their borders, render it impossible that we shall ever again have to deal with the wild Indian. Then the question comes: After the war-path, what? There are two alternatives. They can be exterminated; they can be obliterated.

As the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] has said, they might perhaps be driven into the Pacific Ocean. But that is not a practicable thing; it is not a possible thing. It is not possible physically, because of their being infiltrated with our own population; it is not possible morally, in view of the present attitude of the civilized world. Then what is to be done? Are they to remain among us a foreign element? Are they to remain not only a foreign but a heterogeneous and dangerous element in the midst of our population? Or are they to be prepared for assimilation and absorption into the great body-politic? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the latter is the only possible alternative that we can elect. But we are told that the Indians are a vanishing race, that they are fast passing away, and that in a few years the last of them will have disappeared.

Mr. Chairman, that is a delusion and a snare. I would say that those most familiar with the Indian question will tell you that within the present boundaries of the United States there are as many native American Indians, aborigines or whatever you choose to call them, as there were upon the day when the Pilgrim Fathers set foot on Plymouth Rock. They are not a vanishing race. They are not going to disappear. The experience and the history of the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory admonish us that they have not in them the qualities, they have not in them the tendencies, which would make them a vanishing race.

In other words, they are capable of taking on civilization; of being educated; they are capable of self-cultivation; they are capable even of the highest civilization attainable by any race except the Caucasian. They are not going to vanish; they are not going to be obliterated. Then what is to become of them? There is but one answer to this question, and it is our duty as citizens of this Republic to prepare them for the future that is before them. That future must be a future of absorption and of citizenship as members of this great body-politic.

There are to-day about two hundred and sixty thousand of them under the immediate charge of the Indian agents and more are coming. The experience of the five civilized tribes admonishes us that when they have reached a certain degree of comfort and civilization which has now been attained among the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Seminoles, the Cherokees, and the Creeks, then instead of vanishing they increase rapidly in numbers.

How, then, are we to prepare them for absorption and citizenship? We must teach them the gospel of self-support. We must teach them the civilizing influence of the ownership of property. We must teach them the rights of citizenship, with all its responsibilities. And among all these influences there is none, I believe, that tends more powerfully to civilization than what I have termed "the gospel of self-support." They must be taught that they are not a band of paupers; that they are to become citizens. They must be prepared for the rights, the duties, the responsibilities of citizenship.

How is this to be done? By education. There is no avenue to their advancement except education. There is education; and then there is education. There is the education of the grammar, the arithmetic, and the spelling book; and there is the education of the farm, of the shop, and the field. We must, it seems to me, combine these two forms of education. We can not take these Indians and put them into the common school as we do our white children. Wherever we put them there must go with their education this idea of self-support—that the Indian is not a beggar or a pauper, to be fed and clothed and supported and cared for by the white man, but that the Indian, like every other man, must be a man for himself, standing upon his individual manhood.

Here is the foundation upon which we must build—the foundation of manhood—the idea that the Indian is a man, with the rights of a man, the responsibilities of a man, the duties of a man; and then just beyond that there must be the education for citizenship. We must proceed upon the theory that the Indian is to become a citizen, with the rights of a citizen, the duties of a citizen, the responsibilities of a citizen. When this education is brought to them, the Indians will prepare themselves for the exercise of these rights, duties, and responsibilities.

We have heard something about the failure of our system of educating the Indians. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory have made as great advancement in the last fifty years as the Anglo-Saxon race made in five hundred years. Why, sir, this system of Indian education is not ten years old. It is only five years since we began to make appropriations that amounted to anything for Indian schools; and if any gentleman here has ever visited Carlisle, gone through those school-rooms, seen those young men and young women in their classes, witnessed the aptitude with which they seize all learning, whether grammar, geography, arithmetic, art, or any other branch of education, he must have been amazed at the capacity of these wild Indian tribes to assimilate to themselves the influences of civilization.

Some gentleman on the floor smiled audibly when I suggested a mo ment ago that the five civilized tribes had made as great advance in fifty years as the Anglo-Saxon race in five hundred years. I challenge contradiction of that statement from the truth of history. Fifty years ago these Indians were removed from their several reservations east of the Mississippi and put upon the great Indian reservation west of the Mississippi.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not wish the gentleman's challenge to go unnoticed. I invite him to hear me discuss this question to-morrow.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Very well; I have but fifteen minutes, or I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

I happen to know something about the condition of these people fifty years ago; not that I then had personal observation, but I know it from missionaries who went among them and with whom I formerly dwelt. They were then barbarians, savages. To-day they have their colleges—as good colleges as many in the Northern or the Southern States; they have their churches, they have their high schools, their common schools, their courts, their legislatures, their governors and other officers. In other words, they stand to-day upon a plane of as high civilization as many so-called civilized peoples who have dwelt in the midst of civilization for a thousand years. And what has been done for the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory is being done to-day for the Sioux and the Dakotas of the North and for the tribes of the South and West.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that the day school is a failure. Measurably that is undoubtedly true. To a certain extent the day school is a failure; but why? Not because the Indians do not want education; they do want it. Not because the parents do not want their children to attend the schools; they do want them to attend the schools; they are more than eager, they are anxious to have them do so. What, then, is the reason? I will tell you: because your Indian agents are not half paid. You send out men as Indian agents, in many instances, who are wholly unfitted to preside over the destinies of these thousands of half-civilized people.

The Indian agent goes out there on a small salary, and then he sets to work to eke out that salary as best he may. Some relative of the agent is appointed the agency blacksmith; other relatives fill other places as agency employés; and then the agent sends for some sister or cousin or aunt to come and teach the agency school. The teachers do just as little teaching and draw just as much salary as practicable. This is the truth in regard to the day schools.

But as to these industrial schools, they are twice useful. First, they educate young men and young women—give them the foundation of an English education; teach the girls sewing and knitting and other household arts, teach them to take care of a house and make a home for civilized people. They teach the boys farming or the mechanical arts; they educate them as mechanics, shoemakers, &c. While doing this work the boarding school upon the reservation is "twice blessed;" it blesses the children that come within its doors, and then it blesses the entire tribe that gathers around these industrial schools.

There is really where we want to strike. We want more industrial boarding schools on reservations in the Indian country. I think Carlisle, Hampton, Lincoln, Ocean Grove, Chilocco, and Lawrence have done blessed and glorious work for the civilization of the Indian tribes in the last ten years. Yes, Mr. Chairman, in the last five years, for it was only in 1881 this noble work was begun.

There is where the work ought to be pushed and completely done. There is no reflex influence from these other schools at all. There is a good deal of influence upon the boys and the girls themselves; but they go back to barbarism, back to the tepee, back to the blanket Indians. What have you done to enable him to go back to anything but a blanket Indian? You do not issue to him pantaloons or a new coat, and when he has worn out the coat and pantaloons you have given him at the school he has nothing else to do but to become a blanket Indian. You do not help him to property. You do not give him the means to start in his new life. You do not help him to acquire the ways and the status of the white man. What we want to do for these Indians is to give them the civilization of the white man; to give them the home of the white man; to give them the shop of the white man; to give them the school of the white man; to give them the church of the white man—in one word, Mr. Chairman, to give them the civilization of the white man. [Applause.]

That is what they want; that is what they are going to have; that is what the Christianity and civilization of this great nation of 60,000,000 of people are going to give them in the near future. [Applause.]

We can not go backward; we must go forward. There is no other direction in which this nation can go. This is an urgent question which is presented to us to-day, because, as I said in the beginning, it will not wait solution. It demands instant solution at our hands.

Gentlemen may talk about dirty Indians, about lazy Indians, about wild Indians, talk about blanket Indians, but let us tell them that the Indians who have been on the war-path, that the Indians who have worn the blanket and carried the scalping-knife are going to be dead in ten or fifteen years, but these boys and these girls who have had the blessings of Carlisle, of Chilocco, of Lawrence, of Hampton, of Lincoln, and the rest of these industrial boarding schools are the Indians of the future who are just coming upon the stage of action. They are going to be different Indians from their fathers. They are Indians who have never seen a scalping-knife. They are Indians who have never worn a blanket. They are Indians who have never been upon the war-path. They are Indians who are to become American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, they were here before we came, and the Lord only knows whether they will not be here long after we have passed away and gone. [Laughter.] They are "to the manor born." This is their soil. Are they to be strangers, foreigners, aliens, outcasts, outlaws upon the very soil which is theirs, the very soil that gave them birth and which we have taken from them, or are we to treat them as a great and mighty people ought, who are bound in a common destiny? We have taken into the body-politic six millions of freedmen who were for centuries slaves, with all their ignorance, with all their want of manly independence begotten of two hundred years of servitude; we have taken them into our body-politic, and what has been the result? Why, sir, the great negro question is solved by giving the negro race the rights of white men, to be exercised upon their own responsibility.

The way to solve the Indian question is to treat it just as we treated the question of the negro race; that is to say, take them, after due preparation, into the body-politic, and create civilizing influences around them. These are the influences that shall make them fit for citizenship: First, self-support; secondly, ownership of property and citizenship, and, third, education; and now abide these three, self-support, citizenship, and education, and the greatest of these is education. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have no pride of opinion touching the Indian question, and in what I shall say about it, so far as I can, I shall talk about the facts surrounding him without reference to anybody's schools in Pennsylvania, and after all that is in somebody's district, or anybody's school in Kansas, or anybody's school in Philadelphia, or any Indian children at school in Michigan. If I can while I talk, I will talk about the policy to my mind and from my knowledge that will help the Indians, and at the same time help the white man.

It is not necessary for me to confess that the Indian was here before I was. [Laughter.] There is no doubt about that, or before the time of my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] either. It is only necessary to know that he is here now; that this is a living question with which we have to deal. I am not here to abuse the Indian. He is a savage and I would do him all the good I could, and this Government will do him all the good it can and spend the money liberally, appropriate it every year for his support; but in doing so it is time for us to inquire whether the money we appropriate and the school teachers we send and the children brought East and educated is money that accomplishes or tends to accomplish the objects for which it was appropriated. Let us talk very practically for a little while.

Mr. Chairman, there are about 259,000 Indians in the United States scattered throughout the Western country.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. On a very liberal count.

Mr. CANNON. They are upon reservations covering an area of 137,000,000 acres. New York, if I recollect correctly, has an area of about 31,000,000 acres. I speak of the area of New York so that you can understand how much is the area in the aggregate of the various Indian reservations.

I was curious the other day to wander back through a Congressional debate—imperfectly reported, it is true, over fifty years ago—and I must say I know my friend from Michigan never read that debate, for if he had he would have found nearly two generations ago that gentlemen in the House of Representatives talked just as fervently about the condition of the Indian then as we do now, and spoke of his "early civilization."

So that there have been efforts to civilize the Indians in the past.

Some progress has been made, but we can all see at once that there has not been progress sufficient made but that we may well pause and ask the question if the efforts so far made have been prosecuted upon the right line. If we be upon the right line, then I will pull with the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Michigan just as hard as I can to keep up my end of the double-tree. If we are upon the wrong line, then the money is wasted, and we are injuring white people and the Indians alike by proceeding on that line; because I undertake to say that the child is now living that will see the white people in this country increasing from a population of 60,000,000 as it is now to 250,000,000.

I undertake to say also that in that time these 137,000,000 acres of land, long before we have half that population, will be covered with farms and happy homes, if not partly by Indians, wholly by white people, and we had just as well recognize that fact now. The time has come when we have got to change the policy, because we have got no more country to drive the Indians back to and give him large reservations upon, so that we must meet the question now and consider it in connection with the present territory they occupy.

Now, let us look for a moment at their political organization, as far as they have one, and see if there has been any progress in the same.

The commune still exists with them. There is the head chief and a number of minor chiefs, many of them the heads of bands. Why, gentlemen, because the human animal is savage it does not take from him all ambition. We find that the Indian loves power as much as his white neighbor loves it, and they are in favor, one and all—there may be individual exceptions, but substantially all of them are in favor—of maintaining the tribal relation. You can not find any who will consent to break it up. They do not wish to have it broken up. In fact, whatever we may say, it has not been the policy of the Government to break up that relation, but rather to encourage them in maintaining it. They do maintain it upon the reservations.

Now, I will agree with the gentleman from Michigan that the tribal relation is to be broken up. I have heard it ever since I have been here, year after year; but I have never known any steps to promote that end. It is all lip-service, if you please. The tribal relation still exists.

Another thing. The Indian as a savage had some good traits. Most of them are bad. He made, however, in some respects his own living. If he could not get it any other way he would steal it. If he could not steal it—I am not proposing to abuse him; I feel kindly toward him—he would go on the chase, and the deer, the buffalo, and the antelope afforded him a partial living. The buffalo have disappeared. You can not find half a dozen outside the Yellowstone Park and the immediate adjacent country, and not over a hundred or two there. The deer has gone. The game has gone. What has happened?

The support of the Indian—and when I say of the Indian I mean the subsistence of all of them—devolves upon themselves or upon the Government of the United States, and we appropriate from year to year substantially $6,000,000—for what? Why, sir, to keep our treaty obligations, says somebody. But we go a step farther and also appropriate outside of our treaty obligations for the care, maintenance, and subsistence of the Indians. And the fact is—I speak now largely from what I know from personal observation as well as from inquiry—the fact is that, take the great Sioux tribes, take the savage Indians in the Indian Territory, take nearly all these Indians, we absolutely appropriate the money that buys the beef for them day in and day out, and the flour and other provisions that support the Indian not in labor but in idleness. He does not know how to work, and what is more he does not want to learn how to work.

Yet my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] says we are making giant strides in civilizing these Indians. I wish he was correct. But I do not see it that way. When the buffalo disappeared, when the chase came to an end, when they were surrounded by or interminglied to a certain extent with the powerful white race so that they could no longer go on the war-path and live on the spoils, when the chase no longer furnished provisions, we entered deliberately on the policy of buying our peace or acting as humanitarians and supporting them at the expense of the public Treasury. And we give them a pound or a pound and a half of beef day in and day out, year in and year out, more than the ordinary laborer is able to get in the city of New York or in my city of Chicago. And the Indians fold their hands; they watch their dogs; they do everything that their savage nature leads them to do and they dare do, and the Government issues to them the provisions year in and year out. And yet my friend from Michigan says they are being civilized. I wish they were. But they are being pauperized. That is what is the matter.

As you take from them the wild savage nature, which expended itself upon all who surrounded them and found some outlet in the chase, you take from them what little manhood they had and make paupers of them.

Are you to abuse the Indians for that? God knows I do not propose to do so. The Indian is not half so much to blame for that as we are. But I say the same policy we pursue toward those two hundred and fifty-nine thousand Indians of the United States, if pursued toward two hundred and fifty-nine thousand white people, would pauperize those two hundred and fifty-nine thousand white people, take from them the manhood and the womanhood which they have, and make them drones in the hive of society and worthless as citizens.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Are we not in the present bill following the policy that the committee on appropriations have been following during the last ten years?

Mr. PERKINS. And when you had the power to legislate, if you had chosen to exercise it.

Mr. NELSON. Why then turn so suddenly a flank movement on what has been your own conduct and criticise our committee?

Mr. CANNON. I have been unfortunate indeed if through my remarks I have rendered myself subject to that criticism. God knows I have not pride of opinion or in committees. It has not entered into my mind that one committee reported it and another did not. I am dealing with the question, not whether the committee of which I had the honor to be a member was right, but whether this policy is right.

I will say to my friend I wish I had the power to compel every Member and Senator, or I will go further and say every humanitarian, and there are hundreds of them that mean well—I should like to have the power to make them go through this country and pass over these one hundred and twenty-six different reservations and come in contact with these people. Whatever their views might have been heretofore they would change them, in my opinion. I would have stood here twelve months ago and talked as my friend from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] has talked, but in that time I have had that personal observation of the Indian upon his reservation and have made such inquiries about his condition that I have changed my views wholly. I am not criticising the gentleman from Kansas or his committee unkindly. I am trying to find out what we ought to do to remedy such mistakes as we have made heretofore.

Mr. KING. What remedy do you propose?

Mr. CANNON. I will speak of that a little further on if I have the time, and I hope I will. The first thing you have to do when a patient is sick is to diagnose the case and then to apply the remedy. I want to know first what the condition of the patient is before I speak of applying a remedy.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman speaks of the Indian. Of course he is speaking now of particular Indians. He is not speaking, for instance, of the five civilized tribes.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman for the interruption. I speak of the Indians generally, the great mass of them—of course not of all. And right here in reference to those five civilized tribes; has my friend from Michigan ever been among them?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there has been great progress made among those Indians, and especially, I understand, among the Cherokees; but it is the progress of the white blood, and you can find them as they come about your Capitol and before your committees—men that, unless they told you they were Indians, you would fail to recognize the fact.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Are not their chief men of pure Indian blood?

Mr. CANNON. I am not very much acquainted with the chief men generally. The only one I know much about is Bushy Head, and he is a handsomer white man than myself or the gentleman from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not true as a matter of fact that a majority of the members of the Cherokee Legislature to-day are of full Cherokee blood?

Mr. CANNON. I do not so understand the fact; but let that be as it may, an individual case does not signify a great deal in a discussion of this kind. I am not now talking about the five civilized tribes. I am talking more particularly about the vast mass of the Indians and their condition. A gentleman has asked me what is the remedy. I say first, in general terms, as has been already said here, allot them lands in severalty.

Let them learn that first step in civilization for all individuals and for all races; let them learn that ever since the Almighty issued His command, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread all the days of thy life," obedience to that command has been the first step to be taken by any individual or any community in its march toward civilization. [Applause.] The Africans are wild and savage in their native home in Africa, but here they are many millions strong, and they have taken that great step, because under pressure of necessity before they will steal or murder they will work; they support themselves. I wish I could say as much for the Indian, superior in natural intelligence to the savage African as he is claimed to be. Let that be as it may, I wish I could say as much for him as can be said for the African in America. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] has asked me to state my remedy.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But in this operation of teaching them to become self-supporting can you take the savage pure and simple and set him to work the first thing? Must not you carry education, in the proper signification of the term, right along with this instruction in self-support? In other words, is not the industrial school the great agency in civilizing the Indian?

Mr. CANNON. You may teach a savage to extract the square root or to calculate the distance from the earth to the sun, but unless he knows before that how to turn his hand, and has character enough to turn his hand, to gain his bread from the soil your teaching will all be in vain.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman if these children that are educated at the industrial schools, when hired out to the farmers of Pennsylvania, and the farmers of Ohio, and the farmers of Nebraska, do not work as honestly and faithfully and do not manifest just as much willingness to work as any employés?

Mr. CANNON. I will answer my friend with all candor. I visited the school at Lawrence, Kans., and I found the Indian children very bright and intelligent and making remarkable progress under the instruction they received there. But I had been to the tribes of most of those Indian children; I had seen the boys and girls, the scholars who had returned from Carlisle and Hampton, and had witnessed their condition among their own people, and my heart bled for those hundreds of Indian children at Lawrence because I could see at once that what it meant for them was three or four years at Lawrence and then a return to the reservations among their own people, where by the influence of the "dog" soldiers, by force, by public opinion, by savagery many of the females would be outraged and prostituted and the males forced back into barbarism. I say my heart bled for those Indian children because of what I had seen and learned about the fate of those who had already gone out from these schools.

In company with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], and with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I traveled through the Indian country; we made diligent inquiry across the continent on the north and across the continent on the south, and we could not find that there was one student of all the hundreds educated at Carlisle or Hampton or in any of the schools off the reservations but had gone back to their savage life in a very short time, except a few that were employed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. Was not that because thus far, in consequence of the limited capacity of those schools and their limited number, only one or two children from a tribe have been educated at a time, so that when they have returned they have become lost in the multitude of uneducated Indians?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Swallowed up.

Mr. CANNON. "Swallowed up," says the gentleman from Michigan; and so say I. And I say to him, as I have already said in effect, it is cruelty the most cruel to take these children and give them three or four years' education and training at Carlisle, or elsewhere east of the Mississippi, and then permit them to go back to the tribes. Their degradation is worse than that of those who never have been away, because they go back into savage life when they reach the tribe, taking with them the vices of the white man so far as they may have contracted them and retain none of their virtues; and if this appropriation is to continue for this kind of education, I for one stand ready to take a portion of it and provide for settling these Indian children among the white people until they can get a start in life. I would never let them go back among the wild Indians. I would have them incorporated into the body-politic here in the States.

I was about to speak of the remedy. To do that I shall first have to say something of the condition of the Indians in the two great reservations. I might discuss their condition on all the reservations if I had the time, but let us take their condition in the Indian Territory.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Are the scholars from these schools forced to go back to the tribes or do they go back voluntarily?

Mr. CANNON. Forced back! When the mother and father are upon the reservation, when the child was taken away a little savage and has received only the education of three or four or five years at one of these schools and then has been turned out upon the world and has his transportation back to the tribe paid by the Government, what else can he do in his weakness but go back?

Mr. STEWART. Nothing.

Mr. CANNON. Nothing, says the gentleman from Vermont, and that is the proper answer.

Promoters of these schools are anxious to fill them up. Many institutions are anxious to have these children. They go out and compete for them. Notice is given among the different tribes. Says the agent, "Bring in your children, or I will cut off your rations." They cast about to get these children—generally the orphans first—the helpless, the weak, and the defenseless.

I will not stop to refer to many instances, but I will mention one marked case which I have in my mind. In the very depth of winter, with the thermometer at zero, and when the parents of the children were off temporarily from the agency, one of these agents, without notice, took children five, six, and seven years old, and journeyed 150 miles with them through the severe cold that they might be placed in one of these institutions, and suffered very severely.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman state where that occurred?

Mr. CANNON. That occurred at the Sac and Fox agency; and they were taken to Chilocco.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not the Chilocco school in the Indian Territory?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly it is; but the gentleman will understand it is one of those schools like that at Carlisle, carried on upon the same plan.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not the Chilocco school, situated as it is in the Indian Territory with Indian influences surrounding it, as little satisfactory to the department that has charge of this system of education, and does it not make as little progress as any industrial school in the country?

Mr. CANNON. That may be true. I beg my friend to understand, however, that I am not attacking these schools because A or B runs them. I am trying to tell the truth about this service, having no feeling in regard to any individual. I know how dangerous it is sometimes to tell the truth about these matters. I know how the heart-strings of many women and many men—good women and noble men—especially throughout the East, but to a great extent throughout the length and breadth of the country, twine about these institutions. Yet, gentlemen, if those people knew that these children were treated as I have stated, that their fate in the future is to be what it has been in the past, they would suffer their right arms to fall palsied at their side before they would encourage action of that kind. Nor am I abusing Mr. Pratt or anybody else connected with this system. I am trying to get at the facts in regard to this whole matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely desire to state that a part of the Sac and Fox children referred to by the gentleman as having been taken from the reservation were conveyed to the school at Lawrence, Kans., and another portion to the Chilocco school.

Mr. CANNON. I believe that was the fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to add that they were taken without the knowledge of their parents.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman was criticising the manner in which the pupils for these schools were obtained.

Mr. CANNON. Only incidentally.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, is it not true that the first appropriation for these boarding schools was made in 1881, the system being but five years old, and while at first there was antagonism on the part of the parents to letting the children go away to outside schools, is not the case now very different, and are there not many more pupils offering than the schools have capacity to accommodate? Is not that true?

Mr. CANNON. In reply to that question I will say that it is not true, as I understand the facts. On nearly all of the reservations the children do not go even to the home industrial school without being forced there. As the gentleman from Indiana has said, the agent is supreme. He has the police back of him, and if necessary the Army. He says, "You people have not anything to eat except as I give you rations; bring in your children;" and among the bitterest complaints that we heard were those which arose from the fact that these children were forced even into the reservation schools. The Indian does not want to be educated. Education is not fashionable among the Indians.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Would the gentleman consider it a calamity if the ration were cut off?

Mr. CANNON. If you cut off the ration, as the Indian has no habit of industry, but one of two things can happen; either he goes upon the war-path and in the light of burning homes captures subsistence or he starves.

Mr. CUTCHEON. We have not had many "burning homes" since this educational system went into effect. The little raid of the Apaches is the only thing of that kind that we have had.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman thinks that this educational system has affected in the slightest degree the moral tone or the war tone or the peace tone of these tribes he is very greatly mistaken. The Cheyenne Indian upon the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation is to-day the same Cheyenne he was when his Northern brother a few years ago broke out under the lead of Dull Knife and marched in the light of blazing homes and in a path of blood through Kansas and Nebraska, and he is a magnificent type of the Indian, physically speaking.

Mr. KING. If the system adopted by the Government should continue to be carried on, how long does the gentleman think it will be before the civilized condition of the Indian is brought about?

Mr. CANNON. It will be for ever and a day if the present system is substantially carried on, because by this system of supporting the Indians without labor you make paupers of them and their children. They are pauperized as fast as they grow up, and you never can educate them or civilize them.

Mr. PERKINS. But does not this system of education contemplate work? Are not the children at the industrial schools taught to work?

Mr. CANNON. I grant you they work at the schools; but they do not work anywhere else. No; they do not.

Mr. ROGERS. Educated paupers, that is what they are.

Mr. CANNON. Very many of them are magnificent specimens of physical manhood; but I say again, Mr. Chairman, to send these men back to their tribes to go again into savagery, to remain in the condition from which they came—I say again, Mr. Chairman, with all the force I can command, it is the most cruel thing which could be done short of their death by violence, and even death does not destroy the soul.

Mr. DORSEY. The gentleman himself was at the Pine Ridge agency, and he must recall the number of improvements made there, the lands which were opened up, the fences constructed, and the progress generally made.

Mr. CANNON. It would take me some time to discuss fully in reference to these Indian reservations. My friend asks me whether I did not notice improvements upon the Indian reservation to which he refers when we went there. I did see up and down through the valleys a number of little houses built principally by the Government; that is, the doors and windows, and other things of that kind, were furnished by the Government, and the people upon the reservations put them together. I saw in one or two valleys a few plats of corn, which, to my mind, were a very weak attempt at agriculture. I also saw those Indians come together under Young-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horses, six or seven thousand of them, trooping in, Indians and ponies, and I saw them absolutely relying for their subsistence, not upon the corn, not upon the wheat, not upon their toil, but the appropriations under the treaty, which was a more substantial subsistence than would be consumed by the average American citizen.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois if he had a treaty with the Government to give him a certain sum he would not take the amount which the Government had contracted to give him?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; I would probably be pauperized as they are. I hope I may be allowed to go on with my remarks.

Mr. DORSEY. One question further. Did you not also find there at the reservation——

Mr. CANNON. I hope I will be permitted to go on with my remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Two gentlemen are already upon the floor asking the gentleman from Illinois to yield to them.

Mr. DORSEY. Those civilized Indians are what are termed progressive Indians, while the old Red Cloud Indians made up the obstruction party. Those people who are under Young-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horses are anxious to have their children educated. Is not that true?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Kansas I can not go into the whole subject. I can not enter into a discussion in particular as to the difficulties of the Red Cloud party or the anti-Red Cloud party, because it would take a day and a half to exhaust the subject. Most of the Indians who are gathered together at the Pine Ridge agency are in the main savages, the very same savages with which war was apprehended not very long since.

Mr. DORSEY. But have they not made progress?

Mr. CANNON. They are bound to make progress. If the gentleman will do me the honor to listen to me I will tell him the line I would take in reference to these Indians, and just exactly what I would do if I had the power to carry out my views in view of the experience we have already had on this very subject. [Cries of "That is what we want!" and applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. [Cries of "Go on!"] Has the gentleman made a computation as to this matter? He is discussing the subsistance or maintenance of these Indians by the Government. [Cries of "Go on!"] I desire to ask him whether he has made a computation to determine how much for the purpose of subsistence is made to these Indians by this bill per capita? Less than $17 to the Indian.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will be allowed to proceed. We have had all these evils of the system already presented. Now we want to know what is the remedy. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Let us inquire as to the remedy; and to do that let me pay a little more attention for the few minutes remaining to me to the Indian Territory. That is the best known of all these Indian reservations. We passed into the Territory at New Kiowa, and so on down to Cantonment and Fort Reno and out through Oklahoma. The Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation, you will recollect, was the reservation from which the cattle lessees were removed last summer. It contains about 4,297,000 acres. I have it here exactly, but I can not lay my hands upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is a little less.

Mr. CANNON. It has upon it thirty-six hundred Indians—Arapahoes and Cheyennes—men, women, and children.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Thirty-three hundred.

Mr. CANNON. There are a thousand acres of it in cultivation as the result of the efforts of the farmers and of the employés at the different schools and the agency and the Indians out of the over 4,000,000 of acres of that magnificent reservation. These Cheyennes, I will say, are men of fine physical forms. They are the best I ever saw. The gentleman will not forget that last spring or summer, when these very same Cheyennes wanted to go upon the war-path, General Sheridan was then sent down there to quell the disturbance. There was at that time a greater concentration of troops bearing upon that reservation than had been concentrated upon one point since the close of the war.

What next? The cattle-men were put off the reservations, and properly so, as I think I will be able to show you a little later on. The grass grew up and was not consumed by anything except the fire. What next? With troops sufficient to keep the Indians from going on the war-path, and issuing them full rations, including clothing, and with three, yes four, boarding schools for the education of their children, we enlisted three hundred of these Indians as scouts, giving them the pay of a private soldier, with 50 cents a day for their ponies in addition.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To help drive the cattle-men off?

Mr. HOLMAN. The army was there to put the cattle-men off; but this was done to give them additional employment. I merely speak of it as a fact, and I do not pretend to criticise it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What has been done with these scouts?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, they are employed in the regular service.

Now, a step further touching the Indian Territory. There are 41,000,000 acres, in round numbers, in that magnificent Territory, and there are about seventy-nine thousand Indians, including those of the civilized tribes, in the Territory. There are yet over 7,000,000 acres of land, leased by these Indians in the Territory, in the occupancy of white men.

Now, if you will go with me a moment longer I will tell you a little bit of history, for it all bears upon the remedy of which I will speak later.

In 1866, you will remember, a treaty was made with the Creeks and the Seminoles, and another with the Cherokees, by which treatics cessions of portions of their lands were made for the purpose of opening them up for settlement by Indians and freedmen.

The lands which we got from the Seminoles and the Creeks were paid for, every acre of it. Several tribes were located upon the lands, the Cheyennes and Arapahoes by executive order taking possession of the reservation known as such. Then the Oklahoma strip was paid for, 1,700,000 acres, but not occupied by anybody; and let me pause here just one minute to say that until a further agreement is made we ought not to occupy it, because we got Oklahoma and that whole territory for a specific purpose, namely, to settle upon it Indians and the freedmen, and now that we do not need it for that purpose the treaty or agreement should be modified, and as I will show you these lands should then be thrown open to settlement.

A little north of that we got the Cherokee outlet, and we settled upon that the Osages and a number of tribes; but there is yet left of that cession about six millions of acres of land west of the Cherokees proper, which they leased to the cattle-men on ten years' or perhaps on five years' leases, which has been for some time and still is in the possession of the cattle-men. That land has been appraised and partly paid for. In 1883 there was an installment of $300,000 paid upon the land according to its appraised value, but under the agreement the Cherokees were entitled to the possession of it until we paid entirely for the land, as I recollect the terms of the treaty. Now white men desire to go into that Territory.

White men desire also to go into the great Sioux reservation, and also into the Blood and Piegan reservations. Everywhere the restless white men are pressing for homes within these magnificent reservations; and, Mr. Chairman, let us pause for a moment and see if he does not, to say the least of it, make a plausible case when he desires to find a home on these lands. Let us look at that a moment while inquiring about the remedy. There are men in Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Illinois, and in Kansas, and they look across and see that magnificent Territory of 41,000,000 of acres of among the best land on the continent, an empire as large as the States of Connecticut, New York, and Rhode Island all put together. They see that it is a mild and salubrious climate. They see there the Cheyennes and the Arapahoes and different tribes; they know they are being taxed to support in idleness these Indians and being taxed to keep an army to make them keep the peace. They do not cultivate the land, the game is all gone, they can not utilize the lands, and the fact that they can roam about free and at will over these large reservations makes them very dangerous neighbors to the adjacent settlements.

These white men think it fair and proper that we should do justice to these Indians; but they think also that the Indian title to these lands by agreement should be extinguished, except such portions of the lands as the Indian and his children can utilize in the future, and that the white man should have a home there. Now, there is some equity in that view of the case, because we, with sixty millions of people, are not all wealthy or happy. There is yet some room, Mr. Chairman, for the humanitarian in the great cities of this country like New York or Chicago. Ay, more, there is room for wise and proper legislation under which our own people can work out their salvation in the rapid changes of economic conditions as well as room for sympathy with the toiling people of this country when it is almost of daily note that there is a strike at New York or somewhere else, and the strong arm of the law is called to intervene to beat them down by hundreds with clubs. You know we are not all happy among the white people.

I only speak of this incidentally in passing to show how in the mind of the average white man there is some equity when he makes the demand that the policy should be modified so that he may go in and occupy on these great reservations a part of these lands at a fair price.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman spoke of our being burdened by taxation to pay these appropriation bills. Is not this the purchase price of the land we took from the Indians and does it not belong to them by treaty?

Mr. CANNON. Some of it does not.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is granted.

Mr. CANNON. I do not care whether it does or not. I will go as far as any gentleman will go in relieving want among the Indians—ay, or anywhere else.

Mr. BRUMM. Before the time of the gentleman is consumed will he be kind enough to get down to his remedy?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will bear with me and let me talk on this subject I think I will talk about the remedy, and perhaps he will find I am talking about it now if he will do me the honor to continue to listen to me as he has done for the last few minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. With great pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. But when it is proposed to modify these treaties or these agreements and throw these lands open to white settlement we are met with the declaration everywhere that the Indian must not be brought into contact with the white man, that if you do you contaminate him and demoralize him and he dies. That is what is said. Now, gentlemen, I undertake to say under certain conditions that is not true. It is true in the Indian Territory now because you know that that Indian Territory, so far as the extradition of fugitives from justice is concerned, is a foreign land, ay, worse than most foreign lands, because it is the home of every outlaw that has a mind to put his foot inside it, and there is no power under our laws to take him out. It is a place of refuge for the white people who want to go away from their neighbors through fear or through crime. True, the law says they shall not go there. The peaceable white man, the good law-abiding citizen obeys the law and does not go there. But the outlaw does go there and there remains.

Let us take a step farther. I said a minute ago the cattle-men were put off at the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation. But as regards the other 7,000,000 acres of land leased in the Indian Territory the cattle-men are there still under void leases.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And against an express decision of the Attorney-General that they are all illegal.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, under void leases and against the opinion of the Attorney-General, which opinion, I have no doubt, was right, every line of it. God knows why they are not put off; I do not know. And I do not know why you should make fish of one and fowl of another.

Now take the outlaws who find a refuge in the Indian Territory and the cowboys scattered over these 7,000,000 acres of leased land, and their association does damage and destroy the Indian, and such association would demoralize the white man, for that matter.

My friend says, What harm does it do to have these cattle-men spread over those 7,000,000 acres? What harm? Why, sir, the poorest man, whose highest ambition is for 80 or 160 acres of land, casts his eyes over into Oklahoma, that his Government has paid for and that he can not occupy under a technicality—I grant you a proper technicality—and he wants to occupy that land.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What is the technicality?

Mr. CANNON. That it was obtained for a specific purpose. When he gets in and puts his foot upon that soil the whole power of the Army at the command of the Executive is hastily invoked to put him out.

Now, gentlemen, what is a lease? It is a qualified sale. If you can make it for five years, you can make it for ten or one hundred years. If these leases are to run by sufferance for three or four years, sufferance becomes certainty. Yet the poor and humble white man, while he has been put out at the point of the bayonet by the strong arm of the law, passes for 50 miles over this magnificent domain of 7,000,000 acres in the occupancy of the cattle-men.

Mr. SPRINGER. Generally foreigners, too.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how that may be. I think some of them may be home people. I am not here to abuse them. I speak of the fact. It is this kind of men generally that violate the law, that are permitted to violate the law, if you please, by the Executive. It is this kind of men, who are fugitives from justice and go into the Indian Territory where there is no power to extradite them, that demoralize the Indians. So it has always been. It has always been unlawful for the white man to find a home, or resting-place, or abiding-place inside the Indian reservation from the time the Indians were driven from the Atlantic coast away out West—always unlawful.

The law-abiding man obeyed the law, but the immoral and the reckless man defied it and came into contact with the Indians, and so it will be as long as you continue the reservation system. Now, I will tell you what I would do if I had the power. I would not stop with merely providing that these Indians should have their lands allotted in severalty. I would proceed at once to modify the treaties. But it is objected that the Indians would not modify the treaty? I have no fear of that; it is absolutely necessary for his protection and preservation that he should do so. He can not much longer occupy this Territory to the exclusion of the white man, that even if imperfectly developed would support 3,000,000 of people.

To the north, east, and south are well-settled States; already a railroad passes through from north to south, and from the east to the Arkansas River, soon to be completed to the western border and beyond; other roads are reaching out for construction from Kansas to Texas. Whatever the form, we never have and never will—the Indians being in our domain—treat with them in substance as we treat with foreign nations. We practically make the agreement with them for ourselves and also for them. They are our wards, and disguise it as you may they have no chance for protection in our agreements with them, except such protection as they receive from the sense of right in the white population, from the enlightened Christian conscience of the whole people; and such being the case, we should take every care to see that complete justice is done them; that they are protected from their own ignorance upon the one hand and the greed of dishonest or selfish individual white men on the other, who would keep them in their present state upon reservations that they may prey and fatten upon them.

Having the power, then, to modify the agreement, and the duty as well as the power, I would modify it under the forms of law and in substance. I would do the Indian justice. I would take these 79,000 Indians (I speak of them as a whole, because I can not stop to speak of the equities that belong to one or another community), and I would give each man, woman, and child 80 acres of that magnificent land in severalty. I would put them on it. I would protect them on it. That would leave about 35,000,000 acres in that Territory that ought to be utilized. Then I would make it lawful for the white man to go into that Territory and buy that land in tracts of 80 and 160 acres, at $1 or $1.25 an acre, for settlement and for nothing else. [Applause.] I would let the white man who obeys the law, and who never injured and never will injure the Indian intentionally—I would let him take his implements of husbandry with him and his Bible and march in and settle among the Indians.

A MEMBER. And his courts.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, his courts, his school-houses, all the appliances of his civilization. And I would have him settle among the Indians. I would not have the Indians off in a little knot at one side—a knot of concentrated barbarism. O, no. I would intersettle them with this sober, Christian, magnificent, yeomanry of ours that has made this country, and that now amid the storm and the tempest and the mutterings preserves the country and will continue to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless you entailed the land on the Indians how long would it be before the white men would get it?

Mr. CANNON. I would make it inalienable for a generation, at least, and after I had sold those 35,000,000 acres of land at a dollar an acre, or whatever the price might be, I would hold the money in trust for the Indian. I would use the interest to help to instruct him temporarily in tilling the land and to help to bear his share of the public burdens that his land ought to bear, because I would make the land inalienable, and I would not expect the Indian to pay his full share of taxes like the white man from his own labor at first.

A MEMBER. Would you pauperize him?

Mr. CANNON. No; I would not pauperize him. But the Indian, I apprehend, could not pay taxes upon his land as the white man could, and he would have property enough left in this body of magnificent land to produce interest sufficient to meet his full share of the public burdens until he could stand alone.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could you civilize the Indian enough in one generation to enable him to protect his lands against the white man's efforts to get them away?

Mr. CANNON. If I could not, I would make it inalienable for two or three generations. The result of the policy I have indicated would be a splendid civilization in that Indian Territory and in the large Sioux reservation inside of ten years. I do not think you would ever be able to do much with the adult Indian, but I believe that by intersettling them with the whites, and with ten, thirty, fifty, or a hundred white men to every Indian, the Indians, having the example of industry constantly before their eyes, would learn that if they would eat they must labor, and would rapidly become civilized. Why, gentlemen, if the Indian can not be civilized in that way, then in the very nature of things he will be exterminated; because with only sixty millions of people you know how much territory we have already spread over.

In less than a century we shall have from two hundred and fifty millions to three hundred millions of people, and do you not know that even if you should build walls of steel around these reservations they would not stand against this vigorous, progressive, ever-increasing, ever-advancing white population?

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, and I speak after some observation and much thought, the legislators who still continue this reservation system and put off for a few years to come entering somewhere upon the line of policy I have indicated, are rendering the future of the Indians a future of certain destruction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the balance of my time, fifteen minutes, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it not a fact that these annuities which you say pauperize the Indians are very rapidly expiring, and in a few years will they not all expire and remit the Indians necessarily to self-support?

Mr. CANNON. In reply to that question, I will say to my friend that the Indian on the reservation without help starves or murders. We do not intend that he shall do either. We must continue to feed him; we are obliged to do it until we break up his reservation, and either settle him among the whites or provide for him otherwise.

Mr. MCADOO. What is the use of the large reservation when it is devoid of game?

Mr. CANNON. It is worse than useless to the Indians and useless to the white men. It is demoralizing from every standpoint.

But, says somebody, perchance by way of criticism, "Are the aborigines to be swept out?" Why, gentlemen, if you are to preserve the identity of the Indian character, then you ought to concentrate the Indians upon one compact reservation; and even then you could not do it. If you want to civilize them without breaking up the tribal relation, you should scatter them from one ocean to the other and have only a few together and upon small reservations—the smaller the better.

While talking upon this question, I want to refer to a step that was taken along this line by the last Congress. It was thought of very carefully; it was discussed in the committee-room; it was discussed in the conference committee. The last Congress took a decided step toward the solution of this question—a step that must be followed out before you can solve the question. I read from the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1885. Listen:

SEC. 8. That the President is hereby authorized to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees for the purpose of opening up to settlement under the homestead law the unassigned lands in said Indian Territory ceded by them respectively to the United States by the several treaties of August 11, 1866, March 21, 1866, and July 19, 1866; and for that purpose the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated.

Congress intended that a step should be taken—the first step in that direction—looking toward the abrogation of those treaties and the throwing open of these lands.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That refers to the Oklahoma territory.

Mr. CANNON. Not only Oklahoma, but the vast region of six million acres embraced in the Cherokee strip that lies just upon the border of Kansas on the south. It is now leased to the cattle-men, who have full possession.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And no commission has been appointed.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the law has stood a dead letter upon the statute-book. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to say what this statute meant. I am here to say that under the practice of Congress and the Executive an authorization by Congress touching a great public policy is equivalent to a mandate. Yet the Executive has taken no step under that legislation.

A MEMBER. Why not?

Mr. CANNON. "Why not?" My friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is not here to make an apology for the Executive upon the ground of inexperience; and if he did, I am informed it would not cover the case. It has been stated upon credible authority that time and time and time again this act has been brought to the attention of the Executive, and time and time again he has failed and refused to take action. During that time the President has sent the Army to put off of lands in Oklahoma the poor squatter. During that time the President through summer and fall and winter has allowed the cattle-men to hold the 7,000,000 acres that the law said he should try by treaty to open to settlement. I am not here to abuse him. I am not here to say that he was controlled by this or that or the other motive. It is not necessary. The act itself, the emergency, and the facts are a more severe criticism than I could make if I had the most bitter tongue of the most bitter man that lives on the face of the earth.

I hope before this Congress adjourns we shall realize what the condition of the Indian is; that we shall take the back track and get upon the right track; that we shall be just to the white man and just to the Indian. I want to civilize and protect him, and to do that we must put him where he can protect himself. I do not care whether he preserves his race identity or not.

I would rather he would lose it and be like the Cherokee governor, Bushyhead, is to-day. His fate is fixed. You and I can not change it. In the onward march of our race, of our civilization, there is no time or place where he can slowly through the centuries grow out of barbarism, retaining his race identity. If we would not have him perish we must incorporate him into the body-politic, into the race—into our race. This can only be done by prompt action, and now is the time to commence. Every year that passes makes the work more difficult; for those white men who believe that equitably they should have homes on these reservations are ever increasing. You may undertake to hold them back month after month and year after year, but if you hold them back much longer they will, supported by the force of public opinion, which makes and unmakes laws, sweep across the boundary, and the hand of no Congress and no Executive dare stay them, because no "body" that ever existed is more responsible to public opinion than we, the representatives of the people.

I will say in conclusion, let us here and now take the proper steps to solve this question. Let us be true to the Indian and true to the white man. Your intentions amount to nothing when ignorance points the way. It takes good intentions and full knowledge, both co-operating one with the other, to enable you to march on safely in the course you take and to succeed in doing the proper thing.

Mr. SKINNER. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois how that can be done upon any appropriation bill under the rules of the House of Representatives?

Mr. CANNON. Perhaps I ought to ask the pardon of the House for discussing as much as I have done these matters upon this bill. We are speaking of expenditures now for the Indian service, and especially in reference to the education of the Indians, and what else should be done to establish a proper policy in their treatment. While much I have said may not be germane to the paragraphs of this bill, what I have said in the brief time I have addressed the House nevertheless, in seeking to cover this Indian question, is what I believe to be the proper and substantial means in the way of legislation to settle and adjust this vexed Indian question.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the President did not have the order issued to have these cattle-men put off this Indian Territory?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. He never has had the cattle taken off.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Iowa has answered the gentleman from Louisiana. I wish to make further answer to the question of the gentleman from Louisiana as to whether he did not issue the order to the cattle monopolists to get off the Cherokee lands where they occupied millions of acres in that Territory. I do not recollect whether he did, but if he did he ought to have enforced it. [Applause.] That Executive who had the courage to thrust off the squatters who had settled upon claims in Oklahoma certainly ought to have had the nerve and courage to drive off half a dozen cattle-men who had taken their cattle upon these Indian lands. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. The President ordered these men from the Indian reservations. Then, when it was protested there was great destruction of cattle occurring in that section of country, it is well understood he reserved the extension of his order, intending ultimately to cover the whole ground when the season arrived when it could be done without injury to that class of property.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, all times are proper to enforce the law. Why did not the President say to the poor squatter who had taken up his claim in Oklahoma, "I will let you stay over the winter and let your one cow feed upon the grass, but you must get off in spring." My friend, there is no apology for it. He turned the poor squatter off and allowed cattle monopolists to remain. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. What the gentleman from Illinois has stated may, unintentionally on his part, lead to some misapprehension as to that order. The Cherokees and a number of other tribes leased their lands to these cattle-men. None of these leases have been approved up to this time. The Arapahoes and Cheyennes also did so, but only by the action of a portion of their people. Those who were dissatisfied with those leases raised a disturbance, which at one time grew to be very serious. In the progress of time, as early as last June, it was feared the difficulty created there upon the Arapaho and Cheyenne reservation might lead to war, and General Sheridan was sent to the Indian Territory. It was there the difficulty occurred. The other Indians were all satisfied with the leases they had made, and only a portion of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes were dissatisfied. In consequence, the public peace was disturbed. The Government up to this time has only interfered for the purpose of preserving order in that portion of the Indian Territory where the cattle leases had produced disturbances of the public peace, and nothing more.

As to the other leases the matter is in suspense, and permit me to say further that there was just this about it: The Cherokees were receiving $100,000 a year for the lease of their lands west of the Arkansas River and the Sacs and Foxes were receiving a handsome compensation also. All these tribes, or the larger part of them in the Indian Territory, were deriving some benefit from the pasture lands, and none were complaining or were dissatisfied with their leases; the whole trouble occurring in the Arapaho reservation alone, and in that case, and in that only, the Government interfered.

The Government has uniformly, both the present administration and former administrations, prohibited men from going on that reservation except those connected with the leases; so that any remark indicating a different policy on the part of the present administration in this respect over those which preceded it is of course unjust. I repeat, the Government never interfered except to preserve the peace in a single instance where the Indians themselves required the interposition of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask consent for a moment longer.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CANNON. I want to answer the gentleman from Indiana on that particular point. I read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

The Attorney-General—

Speaking of these leases—

further holds that in the absence of any treaty or statutory provisions to that effect, neither the President, Secretary of the Interior, nor any other officer of the Government has power to make, authorize, or approve any leases of lands held by Indian tribes.

Now, that decision is broad and is unquestionably correct, and it applies to all of these leases.

The gentleman from Indiana says that we ought not to condemn this administration in effect for doing what the other administration did or failed to do. True, the other administration never tried to ratify these leases; but I will say to my friend that the full noonday sun of discussion has fallen upon this whole question and the country thoroughly understands it, and you will find that it is no answer or excuse to this administration for failing to carry out the law or as to the power of carrying it out to undertake to hide behind the skirts of the last administration or those that preceded it; and the case is truly a bad one when so able and ingenious a gentleman as my friend from Indiana can find no excuse for the Executive in his failure to perform his duty in the premises except to say, "Well, somebody else did not perform his duty."

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not sympathize with my friend from Illinois in his very disrespectful allusion to the last administration. I do not know that it exhibited any such qualities of weakness as those to which he refers; but let me say that the last Secretary of the Interior under that administration gave a quasi-approval to these leases——

Mr. PETERS. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am speaking advisedly; that is to say, that when it was submitted to him he did not in terms disapprove of the leases, and they stood where they then stood to this hour, except in a single instance where the public peace demanded the interposition of the Government.

Mr. PETERS. The decision of the Secretary of the Interior was this: That he had no power to approve of these leases; but that when one party occupied the territory and an interloper came in he would protect the occupant of the territory, by consent of the Indians, as against the interloper.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is correct, and that is right. But the moment the public peace demanded the interposition of the administration this power was interposed to preserve it, and to that extent only it was invoked and with reference to these particular tribes to which I have referred.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if any administration prior to this was directed by act of Congress to enter into negotiations with the Indians with the view that the Okalahoma country and the Cherokee strip might be settled?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; not to this time. The subject submitted to the discretion of the administration was embodied in the Indian appropriation bill of last year; but my friend has undoubtedly read the report of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs which afford an ample answer to his question.

Mr. PERKINS. Did not the answer of the Secretary of the Interior emphasize the necessity for action upon this administration rather than form an excuse or non-action?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; on the contrary, his reason for not advising the formation of that commission can not, I think, be questioned.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, was recognized, and yielded for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. PEEL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Papers relating to House bill granting a pension to Catharine Whitesall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BEAN: Petition of citizens of Nogales, Ariz., against confirmation by Congress of the Spanish grant by Mexico known as Nogales de Elias—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 49 citizens of Wayne County, Indiana, for the free and unlimited coinage of silver—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. BUNNELL: Petition for pure liquors by citizens of Great Bend, Pa.—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: Petition of William H. Hutton and others, of Jennings County, Indiana, asking for pensions to all soldiers and sailors of the late war, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COMSTOCK: Petition of citizens of Allegan County, Michigan, asking a pension for James H. Robbins—to the same committee.

By Mr. CRAIN: Petition of citizens of Gaines County, Texas, favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the bar and harbor at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. C. H. GIBSON: Petition of Corn and Flour Exchange of Baltimore, and of citizens of Talbot County, Maryland, for the improvement of Skipton Creek—to the same committee.

Also, petition for the improvement of Southeast Creek, Maryland—to the same committee.

By Mr. GROUT: Petition of A. A. Miles and 113 others, asking further legislation in behalf of pensioners—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, memorial of S. D. Davis, in behalf of soldiers confined in rebel prisons—to the same committee.

By Mr. D. B. HENDERSON: Brief and certificate from George E. Lemon, in relation to House bill 5828 for the relief of Mena Holmes—to the same committee.

By Mr. HEWITT: Petition of manufacturers and others, in favor of the bill giving effect to the reciprocity treaty with the Republic of Mexico—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HILL: Petition of W. H. Booker and 300 others, citizens of Henry County, Ohio, asking for an amendment to the pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HIRES: Petition of many citizens, praying for the passage of House bill 4690 equalizing the right of all citizens to fish in the tide waters of the United States—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial from the New Jersey State board of agriculture, praying that the Commissioner of Agriculture be elevated to the dignity of a Cabinet position—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial from the same, praying diligent investigation as to why American pork is absolutely excluded from Germany, Austria, and other countries—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of same, praying for such laws as will co-operate with those of the different States to prevent the transmission of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases from one State to another and to thoroughly eradicate the same from our land—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. JACKSON: Evidence in support of bill for the relief of William Gilmore—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KLEINER: Papers relating to bill granting a pension to Alonzo H. Griggs, of Company C, Fifty-third Indiana Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition of O. S. Parker, Company H, Forty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers, for increase of pension under House bill 5271—to the same committee.

By Mr. LANHAM: Petition of citizens of Haskell County, Texas, relating to deep water at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MORGAN: Petition of James M. Rodgers, administrator of the estate of James Rodgers; of James M. Rodgers; of Eliza Cox, executrix of the estate of Josiah M. Stephenson, deceased; of R. C. Woodson; of M. M. Lacy; of Mrs. Fannie Meador, administratrix of Pleasant Meador, deceased, and of John C. Bailey, administrator of the estate of Andrew Nichols, deceased, of Marshall County; of Henry C. Nichols, of Hot Springs, Miss.; and of Harriet A. Cheairs, administratrix of Thomas D. Cheairs, of Marshall County, Mississippi, asking for relief under the Bowman act—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: Petition of boatmen and others, in favor of the Staten Island bridge—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LIBBEY: Petition of Mary C. Munt and of Mary E. Stiles, of Prince George County, Virginia, for payment of their war claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LOVERING: Petition of Knights of Labor, Assembly No. 4341, of Chelsea, Mass., and of Knights of Labor, Assembly No. 715, of Lynn, Mass., praying for the relief of the laboring classes by liberal appropriations for public works, and especially favoring the construction of the Hennepin Canal—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Petition of the executor of James Marker; of H. H. Douglas, surviving administrator of Rev. Robert Douglas; and of Joseph Poffenberger, of Washington County; of Stephen A. Thomas, of Frederick County, Maryland, and of W. M. Blackfort, of Washington County, Maryland, asking payment of their several war claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McKINLEY: Joint resolution of the Ohio Legislature, praying for a training ship to be placed on Lake Erie, &c.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, joint resolution of the same, indorsing the erection of a marine hospital at Gallipolis, Ohio—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. J. O'NEILL: Petition of pilots and engineers, asking for refunding of taxes paid since 1852—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of Col. George N. Richards, Hon. H. B. Payne, and 108 others, citizens of Wilkes Barre, Pa., asking that a pension be granted John F. Mahler, late of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PAYNE: Petition of Soden (N. Y.) Grange No. 73, for protection of innocent purchasers of patented articles—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of J. W. Humphreys, asking for the passage of a resolution requiring the Postmaster-General to obey the law—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, petition of W. L. Mock, S. J. Ramsey, and others, citizens of Kingman County, Kansas, praying for equalization of pay—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of J. W. Dawson and 30 others, ex-soldiers of Barton County, Kansas, asking for pension legislation—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PIRCE: Petition of Patrick Gillen, president, Farrell Fitzpatrick, secretary, and 109 others, Knights of Labor, Local Assembly No. 4621, of Providence, R. I., for the passage of the Foran bill for the restoration of the wages paid to the employés of the Government Printing Office prior to March 4, 1877—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. PRICE: Memorial of H. W. Reed and 22 others, of Spring Brook, Wis., on the subject of adulteration of butter and cheese—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of Mrs. Almon Lampson and 12 others, of Eleva; and of W. S. Foster and 36 others, of Dallas, Wis., in favor of laws embodying the recommendations of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RIGGS: Petition of John J. Mudd Post 545, and citizens of Milton, Ill., for pension legislation—to the same committee.

By Mr. SCRANTON: Petition of members of the Lackawanna County (Pennsylvania) bar, in favor of the passage of House bill 2124, concerning the judicial districts of Pennsylvania—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SENEY: Paper of John B. Squires, of Ohio, favoring the passage of House bill 1601—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SESSIONS: Petition of citizens of New York, asking that they be paid balances due them by reason of the inflated currency in which they were paid during the war as soldiers—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CHARLES STEWART: Petition of citizens of Kaufman County and of Newton County, Texas, for an appropriation for harbor improvement at Sabine Pass, Texas—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. J. W. STEWART: Memorial of Knoxville Marble Company, Knoxville, Tenn., and others, relative to the duty on marble—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STORM: Memorial of Knights of Labor of Lehighton, Pa.—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. J. M. TAYLOR: Petition of Mrs. Kate Schultz, of Memphis, Tenn., for relief under the Bowman act—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WADE: Petition of James Watson, for restoration to the pension-roll—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. C. WHITE: Papers in the claim of Lieut. Philip Arner for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, letter of James S. Rulster in the claim of Margaret A. Rupon for a pension—to the same committee.

Also, letter of Hon. E. S. Goblen, of Kittanning, Pa., and papers in the claim of Elizabeth Sirwell—to the same committee.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. WEBER: Of citizens of New York.

By Mr. WOODBURN: Of Henry Donnelley and others of Nevada.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, the Indian and colored schools, supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. WILKINS: Of Mrs. C. F. Hicks, Mrs. G. W. Miskimmen, and 6 other ladies, of New Comerstown, Ohio.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Of Rev. M. Mahin, O. M. Berritt, M. D., and 22 other clergymen, 18 physicians, 17 lawyers, 44 teachers, 121 business men, and 49 officers of temperance and other societies, of Henry and Wayne Counties, Indiana.

By Mr. W. W. BROWN: Of Rev. J. W. Darling, A. J. Remington, M. D., and 8 other clergymen, 3 lawyers, 7 teachers, 13 leading business men, and 17 officers of temperance and other societies, of Potter and Sullivan Counties, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. BUCHANAN: Of Rev. James Fricekett, J. J. Curree, M. D., and 13 other clergymen, 8 physicians, 4 lawyers, 3 teachers, 63 prominent business men, and 66 officers of temperance and other societies, of Burlington and Ocean Counties, New Jersey.

By Mr. MITCHELL: Of Rev. J. S. Breckenridge, John Tait, M. D., and 13 other clergymen, 6 physicians, 3 lawyers, 35 teachers, 59 leading business men, and 1,233 officers of temperance and other societies, of New Haven and Middlesex Counties, Connecticut.

By Mr. ROGERS: Of Rev. W. C. Parkam, E. J. Rowland, M. D., and others, including 16 clergymen, 13 physicians, 46 lawyers, 112 prominent business men, and 13 officers of temperance and other societies, of Arkansas.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. S. MCCHESNEY, D. D., of Topeka, Kans.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, information as to the amount of money expended by the United States in behalf of the Territory of Utah since the passage of the act of June 23, 1884; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if no other committee is suggested.

Mr. HALE. Should it not go to the Committee on Appropriations, unless there is some special investigation going on in the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not see the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] present. I think he introduced the resolution calling for this information, looking to an inquiry by the committee of which he is chairman, the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money.

Mr. HALE. If there is any investigation going on in which these papers are specially needed, of course the communication should go to such committee; otherwise it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nature of the communication will be again stated.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall be glad to hear it. My attention was diverted.

The Chief Clerk read the indorsement on the communication, as follows:

Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of March 10, 1886, replying to Senate resolution calling for information as to the amount of money expended by the United States in behalf of the Territory of Utah.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a bill on that subject which has been referred to the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money, and I move that the communication be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 8th instant, a list of claims filed by the United States Labor League of America under the act of June 20, 1878, making appropriations for the payment of the workingmen of the District of Columbia; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of transmittal will be printed, if there be no objection, without the accompanying statements, which are in print already, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COINAGE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I desire to present a memorial of the National Bimetallic Coinage Association; and, as it contains information that will be extremely interesting, I am sure, to the Senate, and of transcendent importance to many of the leading industries of the country, I ask the leave of the Senate to submit a few observations upon it, promising not to occupy more than a very few minutes of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I shall also ask consent to have the memorial printed in the RECORD for general distribution and information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to make some observations now?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. A few.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Mr. President, the special point of the memorial of the National Bimetallic Coinage Association, just presented, is an authentic and detailed exhibit of the phenomenal increase since the demonetization of silver in 1873 of all the agricultural exports of India, such as cotton, rice, rape and mustard seed, hides, linseed, wool, &c., and of the great proportions which the export of wheat, not known to that country before 1874, has since assumed. The memorial also shows in striking lights the disastrous effects upon the similar productions of the United States of this Indian competition, which it properly ascribes to the recent divergence in the relative values of gold and silver.

The proofs are indisputable and conclusive that this divergence is not due in any degree to a fall in silver, which has everywhere risen rather than fallen, but to a great increase in the purchasing power of gold.

Labor, land rents, and all the other costs of agricultural production in India are paid for in silver rupees, kept by free coinage at their bullion value. The rupee is the money of India. Rupee prices there have not risen, but on the contrary have slightly fallen, and consequently the staples of India are produced and sold at the old rupee prices, or a little lower. When these staples are sold in England and the other commercial countries of Western Europe whose money is kept at the gold standard, the Indian exporter encounters a heavy fall in the market, but he recoups that loss through the premium on the gold bills of exchange which his sales enable him to draw.

It is probably true that if the present divergence in the relative values of gold and silver should continue indefinitely there would finally be such a readjustment of the silver prices of India that the exporters of its staples could not, as they now do, escape the consequences of the fall in the prices of those staples in gold-standard countries. But in a country of the vast extent of India, with its immense population and with the fixed habits and ideas of an Oriental people, with a money to which it has been immemorially accustomed, its prices must change very slowly, and it may be safely assumed that during the present generation at least the prices of Indian staples in India and in rupees will not be materially affected by changes in their prices in gold-standard countries.

Although the Indian ryot gets no higher prices in rupees for his products than he formerly did, he continues to receive the old prices to which he has been long accustomed, and his agricultural operations are undisturbed. On the other hand, the farmers and planters who produce similar things in gold-standard countries are discouraged and impoverished by the losses which are unavoidable when prices are falling. Under the discouragements of falling markets they send less products to the consuming markets, and a wider outlet is thus opened for the products of India.

It is everywhere admitted in Europe that what is there called the depreciation of silver, but which in reality is nothing but an appreciation in gold, operates as a stimulus and bounty upon Indian exportations, which have amazingly increased since the divergence, dating with 1873, between the two metals. This view is taken by all the leading organs of British opinion, such as the London Economist and London Times, the latter declaring "that the fall in wheat, largely caused by the low rates in gold at which India bills can now be purchased, has rendered it impossible 'by any known expedient' to continue the raising of wheat in England," and that what is threatened there is "the depopulation of the arable districts." In the debates in the Chamber of Deputies in France upon the law passed there about a year ago increasing the import duty upon cereals, the measure was urged on the ministerial side as a necessary offset to the premium obtainable in rupees on sterling exchange, which it was claimed operated as bounty on Indian exportation. The opposition admitted the necessity of such an offset, but insisted that the proposed increase of duty was not large enough for the purpose.

The stimulus of this bounty, so wonderfully felt in the production of such agricultural staples as are now exported from India, is destined to make itself felt in every product to which its soils and climates are adapted, and its capacity in respect to what its lands will yield covers the whole range of human wants, stretching, as that vast country does, from the tropics to the snowy Himalayas. Nor is it felt only in agricultural staples. The same divergence of value between gold and silver which stimulates the exportation of the products of Indian lands discourages to fully as great an extent importations into India from gold-standard countries, and thus furnishes a bounty to Indian manufactures. This has resulted in the rapid multiplication of Indian cotton-mills. Cotton cloths are produced there by expending the same kind of money for which they are sold, while the British manufacturers, producing cotton cloths by an expenditure in gold, must sell them in India for silver and bear the loss of the conversion of that silver into sterling money.

The conclusion seems inevitable that unless silver is reinstated fully as a money metal, the Indian competition, which has been so fatal to us in wheat and so injurious to us in cotton, will make itself seriously felt throughout the whole range of our agricultural productions.

When Cernuschi, the Parisian banker, visited this country in 1876–'77 for the purpose of advising us not to coin silver except in concurrence with Europe, there was no example of the ruin wrought by a single silver standard which he held up oftener or in more impressive language than that of India. From that time to the present day the favorite note of warning of himself and of others against the independent coinage of silver by the United States has been that such a policy would place this country alongside of India. It is certain, however, and is as remarkable as certain, that India is the only considerable country in the world which has enjoyed a steady commercial prosperity since 1873 or which is prospering now, as it is also the only important country which has during all that time kept its mint wide open to all comers for the coinage of silver. During the Indian fiscal year ending March 31, 1873, the year that silver was demonetized, the merchandise exports of India were $276,250,000 and its merchandise imports were $159,355,000, making a total foreign commerce of $435,605,000. During the Indian fiscal year ending March 31, 1883, the merchandise exports were $417,400,000 and the merchandise imports were $260,450,000, making a total foreign commerce of $677,850,000, showing an increase of 55 per cent. in ten years. During the fiscal year ending March 30, 1879, the Indian exports of raw cotton were 332,255,728 pounds, but increased to 691,059,376 pounds during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1883, having thus more than doubled in four years. The expansion in India of all its domestic industries has been as great since 1873 as the growth of its foreign commerce. If this expansion is not the result of its monetary policy it would be hard to show that it has been retarded by that policy, which, instead of being held up as an example to warn, should be regarded as a precedent to guide.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Nevada if it is not this fact which oppresses the wheat-grower in Great Britain, that the importer of the wheat can buy rupees for one shilling and sixpence in England to any amount that he chooses, either at the sale of the government exchequer bills or by remitting silver, and then pass the rupees in India for two shillings?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. There can be no doubt whatever that that is very true; but what is the reason he can buy the rupee for one shilling and sixpence? The only reason is that the annuitants, those who have fixed incomes in the world, desiring to increase the value of that which they receive, entered into a conspiracy to destroy silver as money and take away from it its principal use, to deny to it the royal privilege of coinage; and thus after 1873 reduced it from two shillings on the rupee to one shilling and sixpence.

For a hundred years France alone had maintained the parity of silver and gold at the relation of 15½ to 1. If that relation existed to-day it would be utterly impossible for the East Indies to ship a pound of wheat or a bale of cotton to the Western world.

Let the United States undo the wrong that it did in 1873. Let it again coin the silver. We all know from the large amount of paper in existence in all civilized countries that there is not near enough of silver to meet the monetary wants of the world. Let the United States again coin it and put the rupee to two shillings sterling, and it would be impossible that the Indian competition could affect the wheat-grower, the cotton-planter, or the wool-grower, or the rape and mustard seed grower of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that this debate has proceeded by unanimous consent in the midst of the routine morning business.

Mr. TELLER. I do not propose to debate the question, but I should like to state a fact for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, upon the presentation of a petition the question of reference is not in order and debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice of the Senate has uniformly been to confine the presentation of petitions to a mere statement of the contents of the paper. The Senator from Nevada obtained unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed in making the remarks he made.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed that the Senator from Nevada proceeded of right. I desire to know from the occupant of the chair if he did not so proceed on a motion to refer the memorial which he presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know that debate may be excluded on petitions, but the rules certainly do confine the statement to be made in the presentation of petitions to a bare statement of the contents.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to discuss this question. I want to say as to the wheat question that during the month of November last wheat was sold in Liverpool within half a cent of the price in Chicago, and that was owing to the price of silver.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Nevada to ask that the memorial presented by him be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I ask that the memorial, which is an exceedingly interesting and instructive paper, be printed in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial of the executive committee of the National Bimetallic Coinage Association.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists are of the opinion that the wisdom of a government is best shown by a strict construction of and in adherence to its own true objects as defined in its constitution. In this way only will the government truly and faithfully protect the rights and liberties of the people. This best advances, too, the public welfare, and lays the foundation for the permanency and prosperity of a republic.

The persistent efforts to decry silver as a currency, and the constant misrepresentations as to its true character as a purchasing power, demand a statement of actual facts, giving at the same time an explanation as to the causes of the general depression in trade, erroneously attributed to the coinage of silver dollars.

The conflict between two such giants as the United States of America and India for supremacy in the markets of the world for their principal agricultural productions, and the uncertainty for the time being as to the issue thereof, are no doubt the primary causes of a general lack of confidence, and its legitimate consequences a general suspension of enterprise and depression of trade.

In 1873 Congress struck the first blow at our wheat, cotton, corn, linseed, and wool interests by the demonetization of silver.

The act of February 12, 1873, dropping the silver dollar from the list of coins which might be struck at the Mint, was passed when there was no gold or silver in circulation. It did not, at the time, attract in any degree the attention of the country, nor were the nature and effects of substituting the gold standard for the double standard considered by the Congress which enacted it. The act was, however, in the interest of annuitants, bondholders, and the income classes generally both at home and abroad, and it was doubtless by the quietly exercised and unobserved influences from those quarters that the actual demonetization of silver by that law was brought about.

THE WHEAT QUESTION.

The average crop in India is from 10 to 11 bushels per acre, against 15 to 16 bushels in the United States; but India is capable of an immense increase in yield under careful cultivation, and where fertilizers have been applied its yield has increased to 40 bushels per acre. Great as is already the present production of wheat in India it is steadily increasing, its development being limited only by the lack of transportation to the seaboard, an obstacle that is steadily disappearing in the rapid construction of the great railroad and canal system under direct patronage of Great Britain.

It was not until 1874 that the first shipment of wheat from India to Europe was made, and was then only 95,000 bushels; in 1875 it extended to 1,500,000 bushels; in 1876 it exceeded 4,500,000 bushels; in 1877 and part of 1878 over 12,000,000 bushels. During the famine of 1878–'79 the exports fell to about 2,500,000 bushels, but reached in 1880 over 15,000,000 bushels; in 1881 rapidly increased to 38,500,000 bushels; in 1882 the exact amount was 36,485,580 bushels; in 1883 the crop slightly failed, and only 26,021,875 bushels were exported; but in 1884 the crops rose once more to 38,502,285 bushels, while in 1885, up to November, over 42,500,000 bushels were exported, and for over 3,400,000 bushels freight-room had been engaged for Europe.

To obtain such results the English Government has widely and gratuitously distributed among the native ryots or farmers, for the purpose of encouraging them in the use of improved machinery, a number of plows, constructed with a special design and of peculiar style to meet the requirements of their soil. In addition, large quantities of all kinds of plows and other implements, adapted with studious care to the wants of Indian agriculture, have been sent out by the English Government to be sold at a mere nominal price.

Great care has been exercised to select seeds from foreign countries—mostly American—of the best varieties and suitable for the soil of India.

PRICE OF LABOR AND LIVING CONTRASTED.

The Indian ryot or farmer lives in a bamboo hut; cost about 20 rupees or $9.60; his utensils, a few earthenware pots, value 2 or 3 rupees or 96 cents to $1.44. His meals consist of half an anna's (1½ cents) worth of rice or millet seed. His farming outfit consists of rude plow, a primitive wooden cart constructed with his own hands, a grubbing-hoe, a pair of bullocks, a few cows or sheep. He cuts his grain with a sickle, treads it out with his bullocks, winnows it in the air, and carries it to market on his back. If he employs a farm hand it is at about 2 annas (6 cents) per day. These circumstances tend toward an equalization of the terms of competition between the Indian and American farmers in laying down wheat in Europe, but notwithstanding the low wages of India and its increased railroad facilities, it would still be impossible for the Indian ryot to sell wheat as cheaply in Liverpool as the American farmer were it not for the divergence caused by legislation in the relative values of gold and silver.

OUR HEAVY LOSSES.

The exportation of wheat from India during 1884 and the eleven months of 1885 amounted to over 84,400,000 bushels, representing a loss of over $80,000,000 to our farmers and of over 3,500,000 tons of freight to our "granger" railroads, and of over $17,000,000 on their earnings.

It is needless to point out the manifold ways in which such a subtraction from one principal article of our export trade has made itself felt in all employments, and to the detriment of all branches of business.

But this is not all. On the 22d of October last, Indian wheat sold in Liverpool at 89 cents per bushel; while quality for quality compared, brought in Chicago on that day 88½ cents. The cost of transportation, partly by water, of each bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York is a little over 6 cents; the present lay down cost of wheat from New York to Liverpool is.

	Cents.
Free on board and insurance per bushel	1.00
Freight to Liverpool	6.82
Cost of discharging in Liverpool without commission	4.50
Total per bushel	12.32

Add to it 6½ cents from Chicago to New York and the cost of transportation, less commission, is just 18½ cents per bushel, which added to 88½ cost in Chicago brings our American wheat in Liverpool first cost equal to $1.07 per bushel, or 18 cents per bushel more than quality for quality Indian wheat is selling in Liverpool.

This state of affairs is the consequence of the extremely low price for silver bullion which is more or less controlled in the British market. At the present price of silver bullion in London, forty-seven pence per ounce, the exchange on India is one shilling and sixpence per rupee, or 33⅓ per cent. in favor of the British importer of India's wheat, who with one thousand pounds sterling purchases 13,333 rupees instead of 10,000 rupees, which is all he could have purchased for that number of pounds in 1873, and yet the purchasing power in India of the rupee is a little greater now than it was in 1873.

Add, therefore, to the ruling rate of 89 cents per bushel of wheat in Liverpool the 33⅓ per cent. and the price at once advances to $1.19 per bushel. This rate of $1.19 in Liverpool, less freight and other charges from New York to Liverpool, would leave the market price of wheat in New York $1.06⅔ per bushel, in place of 90½ cents, the now ruling rate; and in Chicago it would be equal to $1 in place of 85 cents per bushel as it is now. It is evident from these figures that the restoration of silver to its old place by free coinage would at once enable the American farmer to put Indian wheat out of the European markets.

This price of 89 cents per bushel in Liverpool not only prevents us from exporting our wheat, but actually regulates the market value of it to the detriment of our farmers, who lose from 20 to 25 cents per bushel on their wheat in order to enable them to meet the now ruling low market price in Liverpool. These 20 to 25 cents on our present crop of 1885 of 352,000,000 bushels of wheat mean a loss to the American farmers of from $70,000,000 to $88,000,000.

RAPID DECLINE IN OUR WHEAT EXPORTS.

Let us review the rapid decline in our wheat exports for the past few years.

In 1883 we exported 106,385,828 bushels, for which we received $119,879,341, equal to $1.12⅔ per bushel.

In 1884 our exports declined over 30 per cent., and we exported only 70,349,012 bushels, for which we received $75,026,584 or 1.06\frac{45}{100}$ per bushel.

In 1885 we exported some 84,500,000 bushels of wheat, for which we received only $72,933,097, or 86.32 cents per bushel, while the year previous we got over $75,026,000 for only 70,349,012 bushels, a loss of over 20 cents on each bushel.

Not only has the American farmer been a direct loser by this reduction of the demand and price abroad for his wheat product, but he has indirectly suffered in still greater degree by the resulting depreciation of his whole crop, whether consumed at home or sent abroad; and on the crop of 1885 alone, so far, he has submitted to a loss of over $70,400,000 as compared with last year's price.

This one fact is therefore proved beyond cavil or dispute, and should always be borne in mind, that to destroy the profits of the American wheat-grower it is not necessary that India should raise a crop which will meet the whole demand of Europe; it has but to furnish such a portion of the amount as will prevent an advance in the price to a point which will repay the cost of production by our own farmers.

How important a part the wheat crop of this country constitutes of the total of our exports is shown by the fact that since 1873 to 1883 about 24.85 per cent. of the whole value of our agricultural exports was made up by wheat and flour; yet the latest official statistics for the month of December, 1885, as compared with 1884, show a decline which must create an uneasiness to all who have America's welfare at heart.

Exports of wheat and flour.

December, 1884:
Wheat, bushels	8,261,153
December, 1885:
Wheat, bushels	4,211,850

A decline of nearly 50 per cent.

December, 1884:
Flour, barrels	1,016,617
December, 1885:
Flour, barrels	757,829

A decline of over 25 per cent., ending with December, 1885, as compared with 1884 and 1883, is shown by the latest official custom-house returns.

Total value of exports of breadstuffs.

July to December, 1883	$88,014,626
July to December, 1884	79,700,507
July to December, 1885	52,998,732

But the contrasts of the average yearly exports of wheat and flour exhibit still greater and more deplorable deficits.

The exports of wheat and flour from 1873 to 1883 were:

Articles.	Exports.	Value.
Wheat ..... bushels...	919,073,737	$1,095,174,727
Yearly average ..... do.....	91,907,373	109,517,472
Flour ..... barrels...	54,001,528	325,308,458
Yearly average ..... do.....	5,400,152	32,530,845

The accumulation of stock on hand January 16, 1886, in the United States as compared with corresponding period of 1885, 1884, and 1883, shows the marked decline in our exports of wheat.

Stock on hand or visible supply:	Bushels.
January 15, 1883	21,909,118
January 15, 1884	33,948,813
January 16, 1885	42,575,703
January 16, 1886	57,108,226

While our exports are gradually decreasing our stocks on hand have rapidly increased from 21,909,118 bushels in 1883 to 57,108,226 in 1886.

In order to comprehend more fully the rapid decline in the exports of wheat from this country, the official returns of the Bureau of Statistics give the following figures:

	Bushels.
Exports of wheat from all ports for December, 1884	8,400,000
Exports of wheat from all ports for December, 1885	3,773,153
Decrease	4,626,847
Twelve months ending with December 31, 1884	81,628,478
Twelve months ending with December 31, 1885	53,025,918
Decrease	28,602,560

If we consider that from 1873 to 1883 inclusive we exported 919,720,637 bushels, or 91,972,063 bushels on the average for each year, the decline from 91,972,063 bushels down to 53,025,918 bushels shows a decrease of 38,946,145 bushels, or a decline of over 57½ per cent. Compared with the exports of 1879, when 122,775,751 bushels were shipped, and in 1880 153,250,685 bushels, and in 1881 150,565,450 bushels, as well as 104,030,584 bushels in 1883, the rapid decline is startling.

The half-yearly returns of shipment of wheat from San Francisco from July 1 to December 31, 1885, compared with 1884, are equally as disturbing:

	Bushels.
July 1 to December 31, 1884	12,447,000
July 1 to December 31, 1885	5,850,000
Decrease, 1885	6,597,000

A loss of over 50 per cent.

The imports of wheat into Great Britain for the four months August (harvest time), September, October, and November, 1885, when compared with corresponding period of 1884 are equally important and exhibit the gradual supremacy India's wheat is gaining in that country:

Wheat from United States:	Bushels.
1884	11,973,160
1885	4,494,879
Decrease	7,478,281
Wheat from India:
1884	6,833,195
1885	8,867,427
Increase	2,034,232

While the exports of wheat to Great Britain from the United States have decreased by over 7,000,000 bushels, those from India to Great Britain have not only held their own but have increased by over 2,000,000 bushels.

The contrast between the rapid increase in the exportation of wheat from India and the equally rapid decline in the exportation of wheat from the United States is significant and startling. The export of wheat from India in 1879 amounted to 1,972,544 bushels, but has rapidly increased year by year until in 1884 it amounted to 39,202,636 bushels; our own exports have, when compared with corresponding period of 1879, when we exported 122,353,936 bushels, fallen in 1884 to 75,026,678 bushels, a decrease most appalling as well as mortifying.

The decrease in the exportation of wheat from New Orleans exhibits the following: 1880–'81, 6,523,747 bushels, while the year following it fell to 2,474,581 bushels, gradually reaching for the fiscal year September 1, 1884–'85, down to 784,195 bushels; while so far this fiscal year, of which five months have passed, not one bushel has been exported from New Orleans.

CORN QUESTION.

Indian corn, equal in every particular to our own of the same appellation, though of comparatively recent introduction, has increased in favor most rapidly, and there were raised in 1882 in India over 75,000,000 bushels. The first cargo of India's corn was shipped to Europe in January, 1883. In 1883 the crop was over 120,000,000 bushels; in 1884 over 160,000,000 bushels. It would indeed be one of the curiosities of international trade if from this small beginning in 1882 there should grow, as in the case of wheat, an export trade from India to Europe of equally as great proportions. It is a positive fact that in the central provinces of India alone enough Indian corn can be raised to supply the wants of Europe, to which we have shipped during the year (calendar) of 1885 62,525,742 bushels, and for which we received $33,090,350.

THE COTTON QUESTION.

Unpromising as the outlook for our wheat-producing farmers is, the future for our cotton planters is unfortunately quite as threatening.

India's cotton, owing to the difference of exchange, has already undermined our cotton future in Great Britain and the continent of Europe.

This is a discouraging feature, in view of the abundant crop which is awaiting a market, which forces upon us the alternative of carrying our exportable surplus until buyers are ready to pay higher prices or of selling at a very considerable decline, and in neither case is the prospect a pleasant one to contemplate for those who are carrying cotton under the belief that sooner or later Europe will require our surplus supplies; but above all we ought not to lose sight of the fact that although last year India's cotton crop was a short one, the present crop, just now being harvested, has every appearance of being an overabundant one.

Of the lands in India now devoted to cotton, it may truly be said that they do not produce one-half of what they are capable of producing under a higher system of culture; besides, recent statistics show that there are over 125,000 additional square miles of fertile cotton lands that can be put under cultivation. In the Presidency of Bombay, the great cotton belt of India, there are over 65,000 square miles awaiting only a demand for more India cotton, and with that prospect in view the British Government is at present constructing water ways and railroads.

To form a correct idea of the rapid increase in the export of cotton from the East Indies a statement of the official returns, published by the British Government, will soon convince even the most sceptic.

Exports of cotton from India.

Year.	Exports.	Increase.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
1879	332,255,728	.....
1880	442,429,312	110,173,584
1881	508,653,376	66,224,064
1882	630,509,928	121,856,552
1883	691,059,376	60,549,448

In fact in the short space of four years the exports of cotton from India have increased from 332,255,728 pounds to 691,059,376 pounds, or over 358,803,648 pounds, over 100 per cent.

While India on account of cheap silver has thus made rapid strides, our exports show a comparative standstill, but when compared with the increase of our crops a perceptible reduction in percentage becomes apparent.

Cheap silver in 1876 and ever since has helped India on her road to prosperity, while the American planters and cotton factors are subject not only to loss of trade but also on their invested capital.

The progress of India's cotton industry is well illustrated by the statement published in the London Economist of January 2, 1886:

Year.	Number of mills.	Spindles.	Consumption of raw cotton.
			Pounds.
1879	56	1,452,794	107,034,000
1880	56	1,461,590	123,052,400
1881	57	1,513,096	151,595,600
1882	65	1,620,814	159,024,800
1883	67	1,790,388	182,622,400
1884	79	2,001,667	212,546,000
1885	87	2,145,646	238,699,600

During that period India has nearly doubled her spindles and looms, while during the short space of seven years, 1879 to 1885 inclusive, the increase in the production power of her mills has been still greater. The consumption of raw cotton has risen from 107,034,000 pounds to 238,699,600 pounds, an increase of 131,655,600 pounds. Let us contrast our own progress:

	Spindles.	Consumption of raw cotton.
	Number.	Pounds.
1879–'80	10,653,435	792,400,000
1880–'81	11,365,000	847,200,000
1881–'82	12,000,000	878,800,000
1882–'83	12,660,000	950,000,000
1883–'84	13,200,000	897,600,000
1884–'85	13,250,000	763,600,000

In 1882–'83 we reached the highest point of consumption, but ever since we have been gradually on the downward path, showing a loss in home consumption of 186,400,000 pounds.

India's exports of cotton yarns and cloths by sea to foreign countries have been somewhat phenomenal:

	Yarns.	Manufactured goods.
	Pounds.	Yards.
1876	6,228,000	14,344,000
1877	7,926,000	15,331,000
1878	15,200,000	17,348,000
1879	21,336,000	22,239,000
1880	25,862,000	25,467,000
1881	26,901,000	29,935,000
1882	30,786,000	29,585,000
1883	45,876,000	41,410,000
1884	49,897,000	55,485,000

Comparing the value of India's exports of manufactured cotton goods with corresponding period of our own, the result is most humiliating:

	India.	United States.
	Rupees.	Dollars.
1879–'80	16,217,470	13,895,840
1880–'81	19,091,340	13,571,287
1881–'82	20,105,160	13,212,979
1882–'83	25,783,820	12,951,145
1883–'84	28,531,700	11,885,211
1884–'85	33,380,280	11,836,691

While India has more than doubled her exports of manufactured cotton goods, increasing from 16,217,470 rupees to 33,380,280 rupees, we have fallen back from $13,895,840 down to $11,836,691.

The decline in the export of our raw cotton from September 1, 1885 (the commencement of the cotton year), to January 1, 1886, as compared with corresponding period of 1884–'85, was as follows:

September to January—	To Great Britain.	To the Continent.	Total.
	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.
1884–'85	1,353,012	944,215	2,297,227
1885–'86	1,113,971	919,159	2,033,130
Our loss	249,041	25,056	264,097

How far low prices for silver bullion affect the cotton trade of this country is best exemplified by the following official statistics, published by the New York Chamber of Commerce report of 1885, page 162.

In 1882 the exports of cotton and value paid, compared with 1883 and 1884, were:

Year.	Crop.	Exports.	Value.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
1882	2,455,221,600	1,739,975,961	$199,812,644
1883	3,266,385,320	2,288,075,062	247,328,721
1884	2,649,488,400	1,862,572,530	197,015,204

From the above it will be seen that while we exported in 1884 1,862,572,530 pounds we received only $197,015,204; while in 1882 we exported 1,739,975,961 pounds we received $199,812,644; thus showing that while we had to give 122,606,569 pounds more cotton in 1884 than we did in 1882, we received nevertheless $2,797,440 less. In 1882 the price of silver averaged at 51 1/32d., or $1.136 per ounce, while in 1884 the price fell to 50 1/32d., or $1.113; hence the losses incurred.

Unfavorably as the aforementioned statistics represent our export trade of cotton, the following is yet considerable more so. Since the new cotton year September 1, 1885, there have been greater losses on all who raise or deal in cotton. The price for silver bullion in London declined in eight days from 49*d.* to 48 3/16*d.*, and the price of cotton fell in New Orleans for middling to 9 1/2 cents, and in New York to 10 3/8 cents per pound. Five days after the price of silver buillion was lowered to 48*d.*, and cotton in New Orleans to 9 1/4 cents, and in New York to 10 1/16 cents per pound. A week later the price for silver buillion was lowered in London to 47 1/2 and New Orleans immediately responded with 9 1/8 cents and in New York to 10 1/4 cents for cotton. In October the price for silver buillion fluctuated in London from 47 1/4*d.* down to 47 1/32*d.*, and prices for cotton in New Orleans ranged from 9 3/8 to 9 cents per pound; while in New York it fell to 9 11/16 cents per pound. In November the price for silver touched 47*d.* in London and New Orleans cotton went down to 8 7/8 cents, and in New York down to 9 1/2 cents per pound for middling upland. In December 46 3/32*d.* was reached in London for silver and 8 3/8 cents for cotton in New Orleans and 9 3/8 cents in New York; while in January of this year 46 1/32*d.* was paid for silver buillion and 8 3/4 cents in New Orleans and 9 5/16 cents in New York for cotton.

It must be borne in mind also that the amounts of the crop had nothing in common with the low price paid in 1884 and 1885, and which still continue to rule to this present day. The crop of 1884 was 2,649,488,400 pounds, and the average price throughout the country for middling upland was only 10.54 cents, while the crop of 1883 was over 3,266,385,320 pounds, being 616,000,000 pounds more than that of 1884, yet the average price for middling upland cotton was 10.64 cents, which, when considered on so large a crop of over 6,949,756 bales, is of the greatest significance. The present crop of 6,500,000 bales is equal to 3,000,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, therefore by 449,756 bales or 266,000,000 pounds shorter than that of 1883; yet it is moving slowly at 8 1/4 cents for middling Orleans and 9 7/16 cents for middling upland in New York; and all this in consequence of the low price paid for silver bullion and dictated to us by the London market in the interests of British India.

Mr. C. A. Haslett, of New Orleans, general freight agent, makes the following comparative statement of the rapid decrease of cotton receipts by the Illinois Central Railroad, of which New Orleans is the terminus:

Month.	1882–'83.	1883–'84.	1884–'85.	1885–'86.
	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.
September	8,343	14,342	9,607	10,457
October	55,157	79,745	52,555	49,232
November	78,880	75,159	75,770	75,592
December	101,877	81,137	91,034	78,547
January	59,339	24,167	23,678	26,598
Total	303,596	274,550	252,644	239,426

In 1882–'83 that road carried during the first five months of the cotton year 303,596 bales, while for corresponding perion of 1883–'84 it fell down to 274,550 bales, a decrease of 29,046 bales; in 1884–'85 a further decrease of 21,906 bales; and in 1885–'86 a further decrease of 13,218 bales, showing a loss of 64,170 bales, or a loss of 30,159,900 pounds, or 15,080 tons of freight.

WOOL QUESTION.

A few years ago the importation of wool from British India was comparatively unknown; to-day we find that several million pounds are yearly imported into the United States. The quality in general is acceptable for certain requirements, but quality for quality compared with our own fleece, the prices were found too high; hence East India wool has been seldom sold in our markets.

The cheap price paid for silver bullion and the exchange on India regulated thereby, have of late years allowed the British exporters to lay down India wool at a price at which it can be readily sold in our markets.

The present rate of exchange on India purchased in London, in the rupee council bills of the East Indian exchequer, means one shilling and sixpence per rupee instead of two shillings sterling, its former gold value in India, which gives the importer of India wool at the start a profit of 33⅓ per cent.

In addition, the British importer of India wool into this country realizes another large profit out of the reduction of duty by what is a practical undervaluation of the cost of that wool in India. Our laws require the value of foreign silver coins to be estimated according to the gold value of the bullion which they contain. Our custom-house rating of the Indian rupee is therefore 35.7 cents, although it is actually worth and will buy at least as much in India as when it was equal to two shillings sterling, or 48 cents. The price of India wool of all grades from coarse to fine (and some of it is very fine) ranges from 3 to 10 annas, the anna being one-sixteenth of a rupee. This makes the range of cost from 9 to 30 cents of our money, reckoning the rupee at 48 cents, and a purchase of 100,000 pounds of medium grade India wool at 5 annas, or 15 cents of our money, would amount to $15,000. But at our custom-houses, where the rupee is estimated at 35.7 cents, the cost would be estimated at $11,156.25, or at 11.50 cents per pound. By reducing the custom-house valuation to 12 cents per pound, or below, the duty would be reduced from 5 to 2½ cents per pound.

The East India wool importer not only has the undue advantage of an exchange on India, but he imports it at an undervaluation of 2½ cents per pound, or, in other words, is allowed to undervalue on an invoice of 100,000 pounds $2,500, an item worth while fighting for, and which, in a measure, explains the tenacity with which these importers in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston demand the suspension of the silver coinage. In consequence, the imports and stocks of East India wool have increased from almost insignificant proportions to the great quantities given in the annual circular of one of the leading importers of wool in Boston, and will continue to grow rapidly hereafter, if the gold price of silver still remains low, and especially if it goes lower.

Or an increase of 100 per cent. since 1883.

That circular also states the stocks in this country as follows:

Stocks of East India wool in the United States January 1, 1886, 1885, 1884, and 1883.

Year.	Boston.	New York.	Philadelphia.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
1883	2,700	279,300	.....
1884	75,000	133,400	.....
1885	27,000	131,800	7,700
1886	200,000	75,000	416,000

TOTAL STOCKS.

	Pounds.
1883	289,000
1884	365,200
1885	166,500
1886	691,000

An increase in stock on hand of over 100 per cent. since 1883.

LINSEED QUESTION.

The rapid increase of the importation of linseed or flaxseed from India calls equally for special attention. In 1880 flaxseed or linseed sold in New York as high as $2.50 per bushel, but the competition of seeds from India bought with cheap silver bullion soon reduced the price to $2.12½, and again to $2.00 in 1883; $1.90 in 1884, and $1.80 per bushel in 1885.

We imported into the United States from India since 1881 to 1884, inclusive, over 5,159,807 bushels, as follows:

Year.	Calcutta.	Bombay.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
1881	503,950	.....
1882	601,286	.....
1883	869,101	347,104
1884	2,469,301	369,065

Increase as compared with 1881, over 400 per cent. New York especially has profited by the decline in the price of silver bullion and increased her imports of East India flaxseed from 42,707,112 pounds in 1883 to 162,408,400 pounds in 1884.

The case is clearly stated in the following from the New York Daily Times of February 5, 1886, and that journal being the advocate of gold monometallism can not be suspected of partiality to the silver cause.

"Farmers saw more money in flaxseed at $1.60 than in wheat at 80 cents a bushel. As a consequence the crop of 1884 was immense, and it was purchased almost entirely by Western crushers. The price was so high that Eastern crushers found they could get their supply from Calcutta at a low rate. On this account from three to four million bushels were imported, and the market was loaded with the same number of gallons of oil more than it needed."

But for the cheap prices for silver bullion such an overimportation could not have taken place. Another phase in this unwarranted competition is well exemplified by the overimportation of castor beans from India in direct competition to the raising of the same product in the State of Missouri.

For the year ending June 30, 1883, there were imported into this country from the East Indies 1,461,325 pounds; while during the year following the amount was increased to 5,142,200 pounds of castor beans.

BUFFALO HIDES QUESTION.

The time when the United States of America took the leading part in supplying the world at large with buffalo hides is rapidly passing away. In fact, instead of our supplying the foreign markets, British India has, within a few years, been able not only to underbid us everywhere, but actually dump her surplus into the United States.

According to the circular of Messrs. Whitney Bros. & Co., of Calcutta, of January 5, 1886, 1,594 bales of buffalo hides were shipped to the United States, of which 1,194 bales for New York and 400 bales to Boston during the month of December, 1885; and for the whole calendar year of 1885 11,299 bales.

In respect to the rapidity of the increase of this trade, the yearly statistics show that in 1883 6,733 bales, in 1884 9,276, and in 1885 11,299 bales were imported direct from the East Indies.

In cowhides, according to report of the New York Chamber of Commerce, there were imported into New York in 1883, 290 bales, while in 1884 the amount increased to 451 bales, and Messrs. Whitney Brothers & Co., of Calcutta, report that during the month of December, 1885, there were shipped 385 bales direct to New York. They also give the total export of cowhides to the United States as 1,076 bales in 1884 and 1,367 bales during 1885.

The shipments of tanned goat-skins, which in 1882 from Calcutta to the United States amounted to only 2 bales, increased in 1883 to 195 bales, and in 1884 to 350 bales.

This yearly report also gives the goods cleared from Calcutta to the United States for the first five days in January, 1886, as follows: 810 bales of buffalo hides, 414 bales of cowhides, 100 bales of tanned sheep-skins, and 240 tons of old iron as well.

RAPE AND MUSTARD SEEDS' QUESTION.

This particular question has the greatest bearing upon the export trade from the Pacific coast, especially San Francisco. Cheap silver bullion has caused a wonderfully rapid increase in the exportation of rape and mustard seeds from India to Europe since 1880, namely:

Exports of mustard and rape seeds from Bombay during calendar year.

	Pounds.
1880	24,375,008
1881	89,176,304
1882	76,142,416
1883	130,772,560
1884	155,592,976
1885	184,374,680

If we could only exhibit such a marvelous increase in any of our exports from 24,000,000 to 184,000,000 pounds it would be as gratifying as it is painful for us to record India's prosperity at the expense of that of the United States of America.

THE RICE QUESTION.

The exportation of rice from this country to Europe has become so insignificant and the importations of East India rice into this country so enormous that special attention has been called by the rice-growers of Louisiana to this important fact. The whole amount of rice exported in 1885 from this country to Europe was only 239,100 pounds, for which we received the munificent sum of $14,689; while during that same space of time we imported 111,954,976 pounds, mostly from India, for which we paid $2,147,918.

While our American rice is for the present hardly known outside of Russia in Europe, the amount of East India rice imported into Europe from India is actually surprising. The following are the exports from India to Europe from 1878 to 1883 inclusive:

	Pounds.
1878	1,842,862,500
1879	2,125,023,200
1880	2,216,630,800
1881	2,726,605,100
1882	2,888,843,600
8	3,125,828,800

The recent decision of the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of the East India so-called broken rice has enabled the importing New York brewers to misrepresent the true value of their invoices, and in consequence thereof 45,494,522 pounds of this so-called broken rice have passed through the New York custom-house undervalued, paying a duty of only $789,233, in place of $1,023,630.34.

DIVERS INTERESTS COMPARED—PEANUTS.

In 1877 a trial lot of 2,240 pounds of peanuts was shipped from India to Europe, but the year following 1,800,300 pounds were exported, gradually increasing to 3,450,300 pounds in 1879, while in 1884 the amount total included 51,880,600 pounds.

OLD IRON.

When Calcutta can clear for the United States for the first five days of January, 1886, 240 tons of old iron and compete with our own home product, of which pig-iron is to-day produced at $8 per ton in Birmingham, Ala., $9 per ton in Tennessee, $12 per ton in West Virginia, and $19 per ton in Pennsylvania, quality for quality always kept in view, the question will soon become of vast interest to Pennsylvania, where there are now so many opponents of silver.

India has iron of great purity spread over the whole country, in most places to be had by light quarrying or collection from the surface; it has chrome iron capable of making the finest Damascus blades; manganiferous ores and splendid hematite in profusion, all of which she is anxious and well able to dump into Pennsylvania, where the high cost of production enables India to compete at a large profit with the aid of cheap silver bullion and favoring exchanges.

LOSS OF TRADE TO NEW YORK CITY.

Cheap silver bullion and the persistent abuse of our silver coinage by the press of New York have been felt in that city in a loss of foreign exports during the past year to the amount of $97,165,803.

To better understand this rapid decline in the foreign commerce of New York city the following official United States custom-house returns need no further explanation:

Decline of foreign export commerce of New York city.

Fiscal year.	Total.	Decrease.
1881	$954,488,906	.....
1882	907,936,465	$46,552,441
1883	892,438,988	15,497,477
1884	870,968,559	21,470,429
1885	773,802,756	97,165,803

In fact since 1881 to 1885, inclusive, New York city's foreign export commerce has declined to the amount of $180,686,150.

RAILROAD INTERESTS OF INDIA.

How great the railroad interests of India are is exemplified by the following expenditure statement taken from Indian balance sheet for 1883, 1884, under the heading "Productive Public Works:"

State railways	£30,030,000 =	$145,945,800
Eastern Bengal Railway	799,000 =	3,888,000
State railways, working expenses	1,706,000 =	8,291,160
State railways, guaranteed interests	3,934,000 =	19,119,240
Eastern Bengal Railways, working expenses	1,997,000 =	9,705,420
Subsidized railways	232,000 =	1,127,520
Frontier railways	103,000 =	500,580
Total	£38,801,000 =	$188,572,860

To which must be added £1,423,000 or $6,905,780 spent for water-ways improvements.

The revenues from these railways and water ways during the same period were:

State railways, gross earnings	£3,082,000
Guaranteed net traffic receipts	3,688,000
East India Bengal railways	4,999,000
Water-way earnings	1,079,000
Total	12,848,000

Equal to $62,441,280.

India's debt on railroad guarantees and raised capital in 1884 was £71,020,000, equal to $345,157,200. When we consider that thirty years ago, 1854, the first railroad of 21 miles was built, the rapid increase since that time to 10,784 miles on the 31st of March, 1884, the possibilities of India's competition, fostered by the London market price for silver bullion, become at once apparent.

So far as the dividends of these Indian railroads are concerned, an extract from the London Economist of June 27, 1885, illustrates their prosperity best.

The Bombay, Baroda, &c., Railroad declared in 1882 a dividend of 11¼ per cent.; in 1883, 12.9 per cent.; 1884, 12¾ per cent.

The East Indian Railroad, a dividend of 12¾ per cent. in 1882; 13¼ per cent. in 1883, and 11¾ per cent. in 1884.

The Indian Peninsula Railroad, 12¾ per cent. in 1882; 12¼ in 1883, and 12 per cent. in 1884.

The Madras Railroad for three years, 1882-'84, 10 per cent. each year.

The Oude and Rohilkund, 1882, 1883, and 1884, 10 per cent. for each year.

The Scinde, Punjaub and Delhi, 10 per cent. for each year, 1882, 1883, and 1884.

South Indian, 30 per cent. in three years, namely, 10 per cent. in 1882, 10 per cent. in 1883, and 10 per cent. in 1884.

THE FALLACY, "DUMPING-GROUND FOR SILVER."

With the re-establishment of the free coinage of silver in this country we have been told that the United States will become the dumping-ground for foreign silver. This assertion manifestly rests on error, and a review of the rates of coinage of the several leading nations in this world will soon dispel all just grounds for such apprehension. On the contrary, with the free coinage of silver re-established in this and other silver-using countries in Europe we shall be confronted with a drain upon us for our silver dollars. Our coinages and that of Mexico are as 1 to 16, which means we give 16 pounds of silver for every pound of gold. The Latin Union, on the contrary, coins at the rate of 1 to 15½; Great Britain in respect to subsidiary coinage as 1 to 14.28. The German Empire as well as all the other nations of South and Central America coin as 1 to 15½, hence the loss on their coins would alone prohibit the exportation of their silver to this country. So far as Mexico with her standard of 1 to 16, equal to our own, is concerned, we have no reason to apprehend any injurious importation of her silver.

Since the discovery of America, 1492, to 1875 Mexico mined 167,651,880 pounds avoidupois of fine silver equal to a yearly average of 438,879 pounds of fine silver valued at $8,777,580. It is admitted also that since 1875 Mexico has produced the following amounts, namely: 6,830,868 pounds of fine silver valued at $149,975,720, or at a yearly average of 683,068 pounds, value $14,997,572.

The largest production of any one year since the discovery of America was in 1883, when Mexico produced 1,476,000 pounds of fine silver valued at $29,250,000. Surely if the whole should, which is not likely, be dumped into the United States the sum of $29,250,000, could and would easily be absorbed by us, enriching us to that amount.

Admitting that Mexico would send us her silver, the free coinage would give in turn only silver dollars or certificates therefor. These coins or certificates not being a legal tender in Mexico would have to be exchanged for our products of the soil or labor, and assuredly there would be no good ground for complaint at such an exchange.

So far as Europe is concerned the amount of freight, insurance, and loss of interest on capital invested and in transit must prevent any sound financial transaction on such a basis.

The only nation in Europe having silver on hand is the German Empire; but that country, after having submitted to a total loss on the sale of silver of 96,551,398 marks and 27 pfennige, or $24,137,849.56 of our money, in consequence thereof, in May, 1879, the chancellor of the empire, Prince Bismarck, ordered the sale of silver to be discontinued. Owing to this decree, which the German Reichstag fully indorsed, the imperial exchequer of Germany immediately put the old thalers again into circulation at their full face value of 3 marks each.

According to the official returns published in the Almanach De Gotha for 1886, the amount of the old thalers thus put into circulation amounted to:

	Marks.	Dollars.
In 1880	12,120,000	= 3,030,000
In 1881	11,285,000	= 2,821,250
In 1882	15,608,000	= 3,902,000
In 1883	17,813,000	= 4,453,250
In 1884	17,463,000	= 4,365,750
	75,289,000	=18,572,250

According to official report transmitted to the German Imperial Reichstag the amount of old silver in thalers on hand amounted to 313,896,000 marks, of which 75,289,000 marks were put into circulation up to 1884 inclusive.

The amount put in circulation during 1885, from reliable, although not official, sources, is estimated at over 25,000,000 marks, leaving a balance of 213,607,000 marks, of which over 5,000,000 marks were absorbed in the recoinage of 1 and 2 mark pieces.

Unless the German Reichstag decides upon resumption of sales of silver we can not expect any silver bullion from that quarter; and even if they should send it here they could receive only standard silver dollars, which not being a legal tender in Germany or Europe will have to be exchanged here for our products—an exchange most welcome.

A RETROSPECT.

The executive committee of the National Bimetallic Coinage Association in presenting this memorial to your honorable body ask for the enactment of laws which will protect the farmers as well as the manufacturers against unjust discrimination in favor of the British East Indies to the direct injury of those interests in the United States.

The losses so far have fallen most heavily upon the wheat-producing States, and whose interests are still in great danger. Next in injury are the Cotton States. These two branches, wheat and cotton, have during the past five months suffered a loss of $70,000,000 to $88,000,000 on the wheat crop, $55,000,000 to $60,000,000 on the cotton crop.

The railroad transportation interests during the same period have suffered a loss on freight at from $15,000,000 to $17,000,000.

While these three branches alone have suffered during the past five months losses from $15,000,000 to $88,000,000 respectively, the miners of our silver-producing States have only lost the amount of $6,800,000, namely, Product of the silver mines during 1885, a whole year, $48,800,000, which they parted with to the United States Mint and to England for shipment to India at $42,000,000; loss, $6,800,000.

With the re-enactment of free coinage the miners of silver will not part with their precious metal below $1.29 per ounce for fine silver, and Great Britain will no longer be able to dictate to us the market price for our silver bullion. Exchange on India must forthwith advance to par, namely, two shillings sterling per rupee wheat to $1.19 per bushel, and cotton to 13½ cents per pound in Liverpool.

As it is certain that the fall of the rupee from two shillings to one shilling and sixpence in gold did not increase rupee prices in India, we may safely conclude that the return of the rupee to its old value of two shillings sterling will not lower rupee prices in India of wheat, cotton, or anything else produced in that country. It must, therefore, be true that with the free coinage of silver, which will put an end to the 25 per cent. premium on gold exchange now obtainable in India, and with the rupee prices in that country remaining unaffected, Indian competition with us in British and European markets need not be feared at all in respect to wheat or corn, and very little in respect to cotton.

Now, in view of the facts herein set forth, we respectfully ask for the enactment by your honorable body of a law similar to the one in force from the foundation of the Government up to 1873 providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LOGAN presented memorials of Fraser & Chalmers, of the editor of the Literary Life, of the Walter A. Wood Mowing and Reaping Machine Company, of the editor of the Chicago Weekly Occident, and of the W. W. Kimball Company, manufacturers, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the proposed increase of the rate of postage on fourth-class mail matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Tampa, Fla., praying for certain legislation in reference to the military reservation of Fort Brooke; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of representatives of savings-banks of New York State, praying for the repeal of the act which directs the coinage of 412½-grain silver dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Illinois State Board of Agriculture, praying for additional legislation to protect the dairy interest; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Chicago, Galesburg, Quincy, Geneseo, Coal Valley, and Danville, Ill., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 33 clergymen, 28 physicians, 17 lawyers, 98 teachers, 175 business men, and 45 officers of temperance and other societies of McHenry, Kane, and De Kalb Counties, Illinois, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN. I present a letter of Louis K. Gillson, of Chicago, Ill., inclosing sundry petitions from citizens of Kansas, Utah, Michigan, Missouri, Illinois, Maine, and Minnesota, praying for the passage of a law extending the time for filing bounty claims. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented the memorial of Louis J. Nance, of Cornersville, Tenn., remonstrating against the proposed increase of postage on fourth-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HARRIS. I present resolutions adopted by Knights of Labor Lodge 4478, of Roane County, Tennessee, stating that in time of depression the General Government should make liberal appropriations of the surplus revenues for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and redistribute among the people in the form of wages funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and what they wear. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a memorial of boat-owners, officers, and employés interested in the navigation of the Arthur Kill, or Staten Island Sound, favoring the proposed Staten Island bridge, and protesting against certain misrepresentations of interested parties in overstating the extent of the commerce and tonnage of this arm of the sea. The memorialists do not state what the misrepresentations are, but only state the fact. As a bill on the subject has been reported, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a memorial of 268 visitors at Hot Springs, Ark., remonstrating against the proposed removal of bath-houses from the Government reservation at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of 18 clergymen, 20 physicians, 46 lawyers, 39 teachers, 110 business men, and 9 officers of temperance and other societies, of Arkansas, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of 16 clergymen, 3 physicians, 11 lawyers, 22 teachers, 45 business men, and 17 officers of temperance and other societies of Sagadahoc and Oxford Counties, Maine, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the Boston preachers' meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, setting forth that since the treaty of 1881 between the United States and China most flagrant and grievous outrages have been perpetrated upon Chinese in Wyoming and Washington Territories and the States of Oregon and California and in many places in that portion of the country, and the purpose is still openly expressed of driving out the Chinese inhabitants; that in the course of these outrages not only has much property been destroyed, but many persons have been put to death; that this failure to keep our treaty obligations and the inhuman persecutions and brutal massacres disgrace our country in the eyes of the civilized world and subject it to the just judgments of a righteous God. The petition also sets forth that the safety of our citizens in China is imperiled by the danger of retaliation; that we have no right to expect that people of a heathen country will be more careful of the rights of American merchants and missionaries than people of this Christian country are of the rights of Chinese; and that immediate measures of a most stringent character should be taken, so that the spirit of persecution and lawlessness shall be sternly rebuked and prompt and efficient punishment visited upon the law-breakers. The petitioners pray Congress to enact without delay such measures as may enable the officers of the law to suppress all efforts to persecute and drive out the Chinese and secure to them the same protection afforded to all other persons.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present resolutions of the New Hampshire State Grange of Patrons of Husbandry, stating that there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body which aims at an increase from 1 to 2 cents per ounce of postage on fourth-class postal matter; that it is directly in the interest of express companies to the wrong of the people, and resolving that they enter their earnest protest against the passage of the measure, and respectfully urging the members in Congress from New Hampshire to strongly oppose the bill or any measure that will increase the rate of postage on fourth-class matter or in any way change the classification of such matter. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of C. E. Walker and a large number of citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., owners and masters of sailing vessels engaged in the coastwise and foreign trade, in which they respectfully petition for the enactment of a law to allow the masters and mates of our sailing vessels to be licensed on the same terms and conditions as masters of steamers, and be allowed to pilot their vessels wherever they are found qualified to act, and setting forth their reasons. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the General Berry Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the enactment of a law providing for the establishment and maintenance by the United States of homes for indigent maimed soldiers of the late armies of the so-called Confederate States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of 31 clergymen, 13 physicians, 19 lawyers, 35 teachers, 172 business men, and 50 officers of temperance and other societies of New Haven, Middlesex, Tolland, and Hartford Counties, Connecticut, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVARTS presented four petitions of citizens of New York city, praying for the abolition of the Presidency; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of 14 clergymen, 7 physicians, 5 lawyers, 14 teachers, 70 business men, and 24 officers of temperance and other societies of Johnson, Marshall, Henry, and Washington Counties, Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Lynngrove monthly meeting of Friends, in Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of 22 clergymen, 6 physicians, 13 lawyers, 33 teachers, 145 business men, and 48 officers of temperance and other societies, of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petition of H. H. Colwell & Son, Charles B. Tooker, Cyrus O. Hubbell, and 124 other merchants of New York, praying for the passage of a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River, New York, for a sum not exceeding $1,295,000, including the right of way free of cost to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Port Byron and Cable, in the State of Illinois, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented the petition of Ernst Hain, of Utica, N. Y., praying for the passage of a bill relieving him from the burden of furnishing certain proof in his claim for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Geneva, N. Y., praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, giving the right of suffrage to women in the States and Territories; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOLPH presented resolutions adopted by the Walla Walla (Wash.) Board of Trade, in favor of the annexation of that portion of Idaho known as the "Pan-Handle" to Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of a large number of citizens, resident in Lynn, Osage, and Woodson Counties, Kansas, praying for certain legislation upon the subject of temperance. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of 14 clergymen, 20 physicians, 41 lawyers, 31 teachers, 148 business men, and 31 officers of temperance and other societies, of Scotland, Shelby, Macon, Knox, and Schuyler Counties, Missouri, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying that a portion of the Siletz Indian reservation in Benton County, Oregon, be thrown open to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of the city of Denver, State of Colorado, in which the petitioners say that in time of depression the General Government should make liberal appropriations of the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and redistribute among the people in the form of wages funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and on what they wear. The petitioners suggest that the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the General Government is an undertaking of national importance and necessity and an improvement that will not only benefit thousands of needy men, but one that will furnish employment for all time to come to thousands engaged in a vast system of internal water traffic between New Orleans, Saint Paul, and New York, that will present an insurmountable check to the greed of monopolies, that will give cheaper bread to the East and cheaper goods to the West, and that it will stimulate commerce, industry, and agriculture everywhere in this great Republic; and in that I am willing to concur.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 520) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1839), for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. 839) to repeal chapter 27 of acts of 1883 relating to civil service, to report the same adversely, and to request that the bill be placed on the Calendar. The repeal proposed by the bill is of the act known as the civil-service act. The committee was not unanimous upon the subject, the majority reporting against the bill—that is, for the maintenance of the act; and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], who introduced the bill, desires that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs upon the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; which were ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1840) for the erection of a public building at Newburg, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1841) granting a pension to Joseph Shull; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1842) granting a pension to Miriam V. Kinney; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1843) granting a pension to Dr. John W. Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1844) granting a pension to Orrin P. Cooley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1845) to extend the time for filing claims for bounty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 1846) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Brooklyn, N. Y.," approved June 12, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1847) for the purchase of land for the Federal building in Brooklyn, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRISON. I introduce a bill, by request, to the provisions of which I am not committed at all. It is a bill for the annexation of a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory and of another portion to the Territory of Montana. This proposition is in the line of some petitions that have been presented and referred to the Committee on Territories. As I said a day or two ago, the committee have already reported a proposition in connection with the bill for the admission of Washington Territory, annexing the whole of the territory referred to in this bill to the proposed State of Washington; but as there is an independent House bill proposing the annexation of this territory to Washington as a Territory now before the Committee on Territories, I ask the reference of the bill to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (S. 1848) to annex a portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. McPHERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1849) for the relief of Julia L. Williams, administratrix of the estate of William P. Williams, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1850) granting a pension to Mrs. Annie C. Owen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1851) establishing a commission to report to Congress on manuscripts belonging to the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1853) granting a pension to Isabella Jessup; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1854) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to credit the District of Columbia with certain moneys in lieu of investing the same in bonds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1855) granting an increase of pension to James H. McBurney; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1856) for the relief of the estate of Richard Boddy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 1857) for the relief of John D. Munnerlyn, of the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MARTIN V. MILLER.

Mr. CAMERON. On the 23d of February I was directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report adversely on the bill (S. 921) to provide for the muster into service of Martin V. Miller as second lieutenant of Company E, Seventieth New York Volunteers, and it was indefinitely postponed. As new and important evidence has been discovered and presented, I move that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money be authorized to have printed for the use of the committee 50 copies of the testimony taken by said committee in the investigation authorized by Senate resolution of January 27, 1886.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that the investigation under the resolution referred to is being conducted by the committee, and it is thought important that the testimony should be printed for its use as we go along. That is the object of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the compilation of the internal-revenue laws of the United States by D. R. Goodloe, be directed to report upon the same; and if their report should be adverse to printing said compilation, that they return the manuscript thereof to the auther.

LIST OF DISTRICT DAMAGE CLAIMS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby requested to forward to the Senate a list of all disallowed claims for damages to property in the District created by the late board of public works, and also a list of all claims filed under the old board of audit and not allowed; the said list to show by whom filed and to state in each case the cause of rejection of said claim.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 149.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to embrace or involve in the litigation to be initiated and carried on under the provisions hereof any lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide, in the cause now in said court pending on appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, in which the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company is appellant and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, John H. Gear (governor), and others are respondents, to have been earned by the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company by the construction of the portion of the land-grant railway from McGregor, Iowa, to a point of connection with the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad at Sheldon, in O'Brien County, Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the accomplishment of the purpose proposed by the bill as stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but if I may have the attention of the Senate for a very few moments, I think I shall be able to show that if the bill should pass without the pending amendment which I have offered, it will be the perpetration of little less than an outrage upon the property rights of another company with which neither the State of Iowa nor the United States, as I understand it, has any quarrel or any ground for quarrel.

The Senator from Kansas stated all the facts which it was necessary for him to state in order to justify this bill from his standpoint. In 1864 Congress made a grant of land to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of a railway from Sioux City, on the Missouri River, to the Minnesota State line. That act of Congress provided that the company should be entitled to receive land, or, in other words, that the State should be at liberty to convey lands to a company only upon the completion of the railroad in sections of not less than 10 consecutive miles each. The grant was conferred by the State upon the railway company named in the bill, which did not complete the railroad in aid of which the grant was made. The company built 56 miles, five sections of 10 consecutive miles each, and there it stopped.

The object of this bill, and it is a proper object, is to enable the United States to reclaim, if it has the right to reclaim, and that is to be left to the court to decide, all of the lands embraced in the grant for that road not earned by the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company.

Now, let me state the facts which are necessary to enable the Senate to understand why, in my judgment, the amendment which I propose should be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the entire distance between the termini?

Mr. SPOONER. The entire distance between the State line and the end of the constructed road is 56 miles, and I think it is 25 miles from there to Sioux City. Congress in the same act made another grant to which I desire to call, for just one moment, the attention of the Senate:

Also, to said State for the use and benefit of the McGregor Western Railroad Company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from a point at or near the foot of Main street, South McGregor, in said State, in a westerly direction, by the most practicable route, on or near the forty-third parallel of north latitude, until it shall intersect the said road running from Sioux City to the Minnesota State line, in the county of O'Brien, in said State, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said roads.

The two grants are the same in quantity per mile and general restrictions.

The act provided, as land-grant acts have not very often provided, probably in view of the fact that the act of Congress rendered inevitable a conflict in the grants (both as to the primary and the indemnity limits), that the Secretary of the Interior should select the deficiency lands within the indemnity limits for both roads.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the act of Congress the road, to aid in the construction of which the second grant was made, was to be built to a point of intersection with the first-named road, which made necessarily a conflict in the grants.

Both lines of road were definitely located and the maps of definite location were filed. The road from McGregor to the intersection point in the county of O'Brien, in the State of Iowa, was 227 miles in length. Both roads being located, action was taken by the Secretary of the Interior, which created the necessity for the amendment. The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Delano, in violation of the law, as it is now understood to be, but in accordance with a theory then entertained upon the subject, that priority of location gave priority of right in the selection of indemnity lands, patented to the State of Iowa for the use of this one company, the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company, all of the lands in the conflicting limits, both the primary limits and the indemnity limits. About 50,000 acres of the land thus patented is still held by the State of Iowa pending the final determination of the litigation to which I now refer.

When the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, a corporation of the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, received from the State of Iowa the grant from McGregor to the intersection point, and completed its road in accordance with the act of Congress and in accordance with the legislation of Iowa, it filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, making the governor of Iowa a party and the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company a party, to declare its right to one-half of the land in the conflicting limits at the intersection point, which the Secretary of the Interior had conveyed for the use and benefit of the Sioux City company.

The circuit court of the United States decreed that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company was entitled to one-half of the lands in these conflicting limits, including the lands which had been patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company. Mr. Justice Miller had as a referee, prior to the filing of this bill, arrived at the same conclusion. That suit is pending, on appeal, in the Supreme Court of the United States, and will be reached there to-morrow or Monday.

Every lawyer familiar with land-grant law knows that, under the decisions as they have been repeatedly made by that court, where two grants are made by the same act, and there is a conflict as to the lands within the granted or place limits, the two companies take each a moiety. As to the indemnity limits in a case like this, the Secretary of the Interior being charged with the duty of making the selection, he would have no right to select for one company in preference to the other.

Now, if I have succeeded in showing to the Senate these facts, first that these lands—and I have the proof of it in this record on the table before me—in the conflicting limits were all certified or patented by the Government to the State of Iowa for the benefit of the one company, whereas they should have been patented to the State of Iowa for the benefit of both (and that the court has decided in strict conformity to law that each company is entitled to one-half), then I have shown, if the Senate will look at the language of this bill, the necessity for this amendment.

I call the attention of the Senate to this language:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Iowa to hear and determine any controversy of either a legal or equitable nature that may exist between the United States and the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person who claims any lands under the laws of said State or of the United States, by reason of an act of Congress entitled—

Reciting the title of the granting act—approved May 12, 1864, concerning such of said lands as have been patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company and have not been by said State conveyed to said railroad company, the United States hereby asserting its reversionary right to all of said lands, or so much thereof as shall be found to have been patented in excess of the amount of land earned by said company, in compliance with the act of Congress aforesaid, and hereby resumes possession of the same, subject to the conditions hereinafter named.

The second section directs the United States district attorney to bring suit involving these lands, including those claimed by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company.

Thus the bill involves, it will be seen, in this litigation, not only the lands which were patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul company, the company which is in default, but also forty or fifty thousand acres of land which were erroneously patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of this Sioux City and Saint Paul company and which the court has decided the other company is entitled to.

There is no reason why the Congress should cast by this bill a cloud upon the title to the land which the Supreme Court in the case now pending shall determine to belong to the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company. The State of Iowa has had no controversy with that company; the settlers who are referred to in the report upon this bill have had no controversy with that company. There is no controversy whatever as to that company. It completed its railroad, the whole 227 miles, from McGregor to the intersection point, within the term limited by the act of Congress. When the road was built the governor of Iowa certified that fact to the Secretary of the Interior. The necessity for this amendment therefore is that if without it the bill should become a law, Congress will have involved in litigation by the terms of this bill land which another company has earned, as to which there is no controversy; and it would be unfair to cast that cloud upon its title. If the Secretary will please report again the amendment, it will be seen that it only provides that no land shall be embraced in the litigation provided for by this act which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide to have been earned by this other company, which was patented to that State erroneously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2 the following:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to embrace or involve in the litigation to be initiated and carried on under the provisions hereof any lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide, in the cause now in said court pending on appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, in which the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company is appellant and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, John H. Gear (governor), and others are respondents, to have been earned by the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company by the construction of the portion of the land-grant railway from McGregor, Iowa, to a point of connection with the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad at Sheldon, in O'Brien County, Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, there is one feature of this case which has not been presented by the Senator from Wisconsin that I think should be brought to the attention of the Senate.

The parties to the record in the case pending in the Supreme Court, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, are the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and John H. Gear and others, respondents, Gear, at the time of the commencement of the suit, having been governor of the State of Iowa. There is another party having no inconsiderable interest in this controversy who can not be made a party to that case, and therefore does not appear in this record. The interest of the party to whom I refer is thus provided for in the latter part of the fourth section of the act making the grant to these two companies. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided further, That if the said roads are not completed within ten years from their several acceptance of this grant the said lands hereby granted and not patented shall revert to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the completion of the said roads within such time, not to exceed five years, and upon such terms as the State shall determine: And provided further, That said lands shall not in any manner be disposed of or encumbered, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete said roads within five years after the ten years aforesaid, then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid shall revert to the United States.

Therefore the United States is a party in interest in this controversy, but the United States could not be made a party to the present case. The railroad company could not sue the United States. Hence, in order to settle all of the involvement in this controversy, this bill provides:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Iowa to hear and determine any controversy of either a legal or equitable nature that may exist between the United States and the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person who claims any lands under the laws of said State or of the United States, by reason of an act of Congress entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," &c.

There is a controversy, and a very serious controversy, concerning the amount of land that shall go to these respective companies under the terms of the grant of May 12, 1864, and that controversy is disclosed by the map which I used yesterday, which shows that according to the doctrine maintained now by the Supreme Court of the United States the selections of land should be made in accordance with the line of definite location, whereas the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company had not constructed a railroad on that line, and in a considerable portion of the overlapping limits of these two grants had deviated from it, so as to make an average of over 6 miles in deviation between the constructed line and the line of definite location. So then in such an arrangement as these companies may have made with reference to the suit now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States there may be involved, for all that I know, for all that the United States may know, the difference that would arise on the 6 miles deviation in the line of construction as compared with the line of definite location.

Therefore it is well to let this entire case, so far as those overlapping limits are concerned, go into the suit that is provided for by this bill to the courts, in order that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, and the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and the settlers on the lands in dispute, and the United States, and all others concerned and interested may have perfect remedy, and at the end of that suit the whole matter may be adjusted definitely and fully. Unless this case is allowed to go to the courts, as the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands provides, there will not be a perfect settlement of this controversy. I do not know what character of record has been prepared in that case; I do not know how kindly these two railroad companies, though contending, may have treated each other in the preparation of that case; nor can any one outside of familiarity with the record know how that feature of the case may be. Therefore I ask the Senate to defeat the proposed amendment in order that the entire subject may go to the courts in the case provided for by this bill and be finally and fully and perfectly adjusted.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have a profound respect for the ability of the Senator from Iowa as a lawyer, and I am compelled to say that I am profoundly surprised at the argument which he submits to the Senate against this amendment. He does not dispute my statement of fact. I ask the Senate to note that he does not controvert the proposition that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company and its predecessor companies built under the legislation of his State a line of railroad under this land-grant act from McGregor, on the Mississippi River, to the intersection point, 227 miles in length. He does not dispute the fact, for he can not dispute the fact, that that entire line of railroad was built within the time limited by the act of Congress. He calls attention to the fact that the Sioux City Company deviated in its line of construction from the line of definite location some 6 miles. That could have no possible effect upon the rights of the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, which had filed its own location and which had constructed its road upon its location. It could not, as a matter of law, operate to deprive that company of a single inch or acre of this land, no matter how far the Sioux City and Saint Paul company had deviated from its located line in constructing the road.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the Senator contend that if the case now pending should be determined on the line of definite location instead of the line of construction it would not project the grant to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company that much farther?

Mr. SPOONER. I contend this, and no man can gainsay it, that the land-grant adjustment is upon the located line, and that the deviation in construction does not vary the land-grant limit one inch either way. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided over and over and over again that the right of the State and its grantees is fixed under the land-grant act by the filing of the map of definite location with the Department of the Interior. That gives precision to the granted lands and fixes also the indemnity limits; and a variation from that definite location in the constructed line does not vary the land-grant limits in the slightest degree.

The Senator is not right, as I understand it, in his law, assuming his statement as to the deviation by the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company 6 miles from the located line to be correct. I do not understand that a deviation of a land-grant road of 3 miles or 6 miles or even 10 miles, under certain circumstances, operates to affect the right of the constructing company or of the State to the land. The Senator assumes that the line of the land-grant road must, under the law, be constructed upon the line of definite location. That rule would deprive every land-grant company that has constructed a road of its lands, because I venture to say that no land-grant road has been constructed accurately and exactly upon the line of definite location. The Milwaukee and Saint Paul company, for whose protection I offer this amendment, did not construct its road at all points precisely upon the line of definite location. It varied in one place 3 miles; it varied in another place, I think, 5 miles; and the question was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General laid down the law upon the subject, I think, accurately, and his opinion has been since confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. He said:

> In order to entitle the State to the benefit of the lands granted, it is necessary that the road should be constructed according to the line of definite location. If a different road be constructed than that definitely located, it can not entitle the State to the benefit of those lands.
> The question whether the road constructed is or is not the road as definitely located is a question for the Interior Department to determine in this as in other cases, and one which must be largely within the discretion of the Secretary.

I call the attention of the Senate to this:

> Some deflections must in many cases be expected from the line of the road as definitely located; but it is for the Department to determine whether or not these make of it a different road, or whether there is substantial compliance with the line of definite location. In the exercise of this discretion, it is impossible to lay down any legal rules which could govern in all cases. Deflections which in certain cases might be held not to change the character of the road as definitely located might do so in others. I would suggest that if the deflections be in their character immaterial—if they were made for the purpose of avoiding engineering obstacles which could not otherwise be avoided without exaggerated expense, or to remedy defects in the original location—that such deflections would not destroy the identity of the road constructed with the road of definite location. Upon the whole matter it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to decide whether the road constructed is the road as definitely located.—Copp's Public Land Laws, 1882, volume 2, pages 791, 792.

And upon proof as to the engineering obstacles to be met and surmounted, the Secretary of the Interior held in the Iowa case that a deflection of 5 miles did not destroy the identity of the road as a land-grant road based upon the definite location, and ordered the patent to issue to the State. The question was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals (106 United States Reports, 369). I will read only a word of the decision:

> A deviation of the route without the consent of Congress, so as to take the road beyond the lands granted—

Which in this case was beyond 10 miles from the line of definite location—> might, perhaps, raise the question whether the grant was not abandoned.

There has never been any claim upon the part of the Government that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company had failed in its duty in the construction of this road. On the contrary, the only deviation it made was presented to the Department of the Interior, and upon proof explaining why the deflection was made the Department sanctioned it, and it was held to be in accordance with the act of Congress.

Now why should the United States have been made a party to this litigation? Does the Senator from Iowa give to the Senate any reason why the Government should be made a party? What does the Government seek to assert against this company? I ask the Senator from Iowa if the State of Iowa has had any controversy with this company as to its performance of the conditions named in this land-grant act?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The United States has that definite interest which arises from the proviso to the act to which I have already referred, and that is that in case the roads should not be completed within the term either by the companies or the State——

Mr. SPOONER. Allow me. Do you claim that this road was not completed within the time?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is half of the case. In the event that the two roads should not be completed within the time, either by the companies or the State, then so much land as might pertain to the line of either one or both of the companies who had not constructed their lines should revert to the United States. Now on a part of this grant there are overlapping limits, the lands within which, according to the construction placed upon the law, were to be divided between these two companies. These overlapping limits are determined in part by the line of definite location and the line of construction. I do not know in what position that question appears in the record of the case to which the Senator has referred, but the United States has in that respect a definite interest under the reversionary clause of the proviso to which I have called attention.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is a little singular to me, with all deference to the Senator from Iowa, that he should ask the Senate to defeat this amendment because he does not possess certain information which he might have possessed if he had taken the trouble to walk to the Supreme Court room and look at the record.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Of course I am perfectly willing to have the lecture on what I ought to have done in this case; but——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say you ought to have done it. I said you might have done it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But lying back of all that is the question as to the real attitude of these two companies toward each other; and whatever I might have found in that respect, the United States is not in that case as a party to protect and defend its interests or the interests of the public.

Mr. SPOONER. The suggestion, made twice by the Senator from Iowa, that there may have been some arrangement or collusion in this litigation between these two companies, would come with greater force from that Senator if it did not come coupled with the assertion that he knows nothing whatever about the record or the issues made in the litigation.

This case was tried before the circuit court of the United States after having first been bitterly fought before Judge Miller, as referee, and I can assure the Senator that it was fought by the counsel on both sides as bitterly as any lawsuit could be contested. That fact, I think, is known in the State of Iowa; there can be no question about that; and the Senate ought not to act, and I think will not act, on the assumption that there could have been any collusion in that litigation, or that collusion could have affected the question which I raise here in any way.

Let me—for I do not wish to take the time of the Senate—call attention again to the situation. Here this bill proposes to involve in litigation 40,000 or 50,000 acres of land, one-half of which were patented erroneously by the United States to the State of Iowa for the benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, but which have been earned by another company by its construction of a railroad in strict accordance with the legislation of the State of Iowa and within the time limited by the act of Congress. Some of these lands have been sold; some of these lands are occupied by settlers. They have rights to be protected, as well as those for whom the Senator from Iowa speaks in his advocacy of this bill. I do not object to a trial by the appropriate tribunal of the questions which are presented by the alleged default of the Sioux City and Saint Paul company. I voted against the amendment yesterday offered by the Senator from Minnesota in the interest of that company. I expect to vote for this bill if this amendment is adopted. I simply protest here against clouding title by this litigation, without any reason, except the suggestion of the Senator that perhaps there was collusion in that litigation, which I, with greater personal knowledge than he, emphatically deny. I protest against drawing into this litigation lands which upon no just grounds are involved in it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, either I must have been very inaccurate in my statement or the Senator has misunderstood me in order to justify the statement he has made that I hinged my opposition to this amendment on a possible collusion between those companies. I do no such thing. That is an element, certainly a possible element, in the case; but I hinge my opposition to the amendment on the fact that there is an actual conflict between the claims of those companies and the United States and the State of Iowa concerning the lands within the overlapping limits as to whether they shall be disposed of upon one line or the other. It is a substantial, actual, present, and important fact in the case.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course there is an actual conflict between those two companies as to the conflicting limits. I took occasion to state that fact to the Senate, if indeed it needed any statement. The act of Congress itself, which required that one road should intersect the other, made inevitable and necessary that conflict; and that conflict is in process of determination in a proper tribunal. Four or five years ago it was tried in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Iowa, and there were other parties to that litigation to protect the rights of Iowa than these two railway companies. They made the governor of Iowa a party to that suit. They probably did so upon the authority of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a Texas case, which has since been overruled, but the governor of Iowa saw fit to appear in that case and to answer in that case by the attorney-general of that State, and from that day up to this moment there never has been any claim or intimation by the State of Iowa that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company had not built its road in strict accordance with the act of Congress and in strict accordance with the requirements of the Iowa Legislature. Iowa required that this road should be built to Sheldon; Iowa designated the point of intersection and the road was built to Sheldon. Now for the first time is the intimation here as a reason why all these lands should be involved in this litigation that possibly the State of Iowa has some interest to assert against this company. Mr. President, to emphasize the injustice of the passage of this bill without this amendment I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: That company built 227 miles of railroad for the State of Iowa, a railroad which, if you will go to the Department of the Interior, you will find that the governor of the State of Iowa under the seal of the great State of Iowa certified to the United States Government had been completed to that intersection point in accordance with the act of Congress. That company was entitled, if the grant had been a full grant, to 1,600,000 acres of land in Iowa for the 227 miles. That company has received and will have received if it receives this land (and this amendment only applies to such land as the Supreme Court shall decide belongs to this company, and that ought to be adequate authority on the subject) 500,000 acres and a fraction; so that for building the 227 miles of railroad it is a little over a million acres short of its full grant.

Now I submit to the Senate, begging pardon for having taken so much time in the discussion——

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he sits down. Does this bill as it is reported from the committee authorize all parties having claim or laying claim to these lands to go into court and have that question decided? Is your objection to it that these people would have to twice litigate their title?

Mr. SPOONER. My objection to it is this: The land which is intended to be reached by this bill is land which has been patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company which that company by its default never earned——

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator is making a statement——

Mr. SPOONER. That is what they claim.

Mr. MCMILLAN. They claim it, but from that position I dissent.

Mr. TELLER. The question I want to get at is whether everybody under this bill who lays claim to this land has the opportunity of going into court and being heard? You understand they have.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand they have. I understand the object of this bill to be, and I shall vote for the bill with this amendment on that theory, to enable the United States to reclaim for the benefit of settlers such lands as the courts shall decide, notwithstanding the patent, that the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company never earned by the construction of road. I do not myself see how the railway company or any one else can object to having that matter disposed of by the courts. My amendment is simply to take out of this litigation lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide were erroneously patented to Iowa for the benefit of the Sioux City company, but have been earned by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company, which completed its road within the time.

It is no light thing to cast a cloud upon the title to forty or fifty thousand acres of land. It is an easy thing to do. All over the West to-day and the Northwest and the far West men are in feverish anxiety and distress lest they lose their homesteads, their farms purchased of railway companies and acquired under the homestead and other laws of the United States years and years ago, upon suggestions of doubt that have gone out within the last year from Washington. I protest that without good reason this cloud of suspicion which is involved in drawing this mass of land into litigation ought not to be cast upon it by Congress.

The only justification I have, Mr. President, for obtruding upon the attention of the Senate in this matter is the fact that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company is a corporation of my State; Mr. Alexander Mitchell, an eminent citizen of Wisconsin, is its president; its officers are citizens of my State and constituents of mine, and I have felt it not only to be right upon its merits but my duty to present this matter to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator one question. If this bill should pass with the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, what benefit would the parties who are now litigating in the Supreme Court derive from the litigation that has been pressed thus far in that court?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it would affect that. The only result of it would be this, that while on Monday or within ten days the Supreme Court of the United States will decide that a portion of these lands have been earned by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Company, which is not in default, this bill will unjustly cloud the title and bring the lands into a long litigation.

Mr. HALE. Should the court so decide, would any act of Congress passed now—for instance the bill reported by the Senator from Kansas—affect it in any way?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think that if the company has earned the land any act passed by Congress can operate to take it away. My proposition is simply that the bill throws it causelessly into new litigation and keeps it out of market until this long litigation is ended. That is the point of the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have listened to the reading of this amendment and to the very explicit and forcible argument of the Senator from Wisconsin in its support with the strongest possible predisposition in its favor, but I am unable after an examination of the bill to ascertain in what way the interests of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company can be imperiled even if the bill should pass without the amendment.

Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the language of the bill in sections 2 and 3. In defining the duty of the district attorney, after declaring that he shall bring a suit at law or in equity, &c., against all persons or corporations claiming ownership, the second section continues:

> And any persons or corporations who are claiming any of said lands under the State of Iowa, or by reason of the act of Congress aforesaid, and who are necessary or proper parties, shall be joined as defendants therein; and said court may cause publication to be made, under the laws and rules of court, to bring in non-resident defendants as parties to the suit.

Section 3 provides:

> That the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person not made a party defendant in such suit, may petition the court to be admitted as a party defendant therein, and may set up any interest such defendant may have in the said lands, in such manner as the court may direct, and have the judgment of the court upon the same.

Therefore, no matter what may be the decision of the Supreme Court in the case now pending on Monday next or any other day, it is undoubtedly true that the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company would be nominally a party defendant in this case. It must be, because it is one of the parties claiming under the State of Iowa in connection with this grant from the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. It would be without this amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, it will be without this amendment.

Now, admitting that to be the case, how, if it comes in as a party defendant, is its right imperiled? How is any cloud cast on the title that this company may obtain by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court in the cause now pending, and which the Senator from Wisconsin says is to be determined on Monday next? I do not know whether it is a suit for specific sections of land or not; I assume that it is, and the decree of the court would declare what sections of land within these disputed limits were the property of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company under that grant. Suppose the district attorney in Iowa brings the suit in accordance with the terms of this bill without any amendment, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway corporation either is made a party defendant, or, being omitted, appears and petitions to be made a party defendant, as under section 3 it has the right to do. If the Supreme Court of the United States determines on Monday that the lands specified in the petition there pending are the property of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, is there any cloud cast upon that title by the fact of its being made a party defendant in this suit? On the contrary, on the mere statement or presentation or showing that this is res adjudicata by the Supreme Court, the last tribunal of resort, can it be said for an instant that these lands would be subject to be again in litigation and that there would be any cloud cast upon their title as established by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States in the suit now pending? I think not, Mr. President.

It appears to me, with all due deference to the Senator from Wisconsin, that he is unnecessarily apprehensive about the effect of this bill. If I supposed that there could be any possible chance of clouding this title, of disturbing the possession of any settler, or creating any apprehension even in his mind by the passage of this bill without the amendment, supposing that the decree of the Supreme Court on Monday should be in favor of the claim of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, then I should see some reason in this amendment; but as it is, I certainly confess I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Kansas and I agree upon the proposition that under this bill without the amendment this land will be involved in the litigation.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no; I said that the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company would be a party defendant.

Mr. SPOONER. Would not the land be thereby involved in the litigation?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Supreme Court of the United States upon final appeal on Monday next declare that the lands which are named in and described in their bill are their property—that is, the property of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company—that is not subject to review by bringing another suit about the same lands in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to say a word?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not the section to which the Senator refers that is the operative section in regard to this matter.

Mr. INGALLS. Then let us hear it read.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is the first section.

Be it enacted, &c., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Iowa to hear and determine any controversy of either a legal or equitable nature that may exist between the United States and the State of Iowa, or any corporation or person who claims any lands under the laws of said State or of the United States, by reason of an act of Congress entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864, concerning such of said lands as have been patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company and have not been by said State conveyed to said railroad company, the United States hereby asserting its reversionary right to all of said lands, or so much thereof as shall be found to have been patented in excess of the amount of land earned by said company, &c.

The lands in controversy here are lands which have been patented by the General Government to the State of Iowa for railroad purposes under the act of May 12, 1864. That defines the lands, and these lands have been patented to the State, but they have not been conveyed to these companies. The suit now pending to which the Senator refers is a suit between these two railroad companies. It is only to settle a controversy existing between the two railroad companies. But any settlers upon these lands may come in and assert their right to any part of them as against either of these corporations, because by a subsequent section of the bill any person who has settled upon these lands has a right to appear there and has a right to defend the property in any portion of this land in the suit authorized by this bill. The company has not received any lands, but the title is in the State by patent, and the suit between the two railroad companies does not determine anything as between the State and the companies.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very glad indeed to have heard the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, because he has convinced me that this amendment ought not to pass under any circumstances; for if there is nothing to be settled in the suit the Senator from Wisconsin describes pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, if that is merely an interlocutory proceeding, so to speak, between two railroad companies to determine as to their respective rights, then of course that land ought not to be excluded from the operation of this bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I merely wished to explain to the Senator from Kansas the facts as I understood them, not to influence him one way or the other.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course I may be misinformed. I should like to know from the Senator from Wisconsin what is the nature of the proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States and what relief is sought and what the decree will declare in case it shall be in favor of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company.

Mr. SPOONER. I have been exceedingly unfortunate in my statement of facts if I have not made an impression on the Senator from Kansas as to the character of that litigation. It is a suit pending between the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company on the one hand, and the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company and the governor of Iowa and the land officer of Iowa—I do not remember his designation—on the other, to determine the rights of the respective companies in the lands within the overlapping limits, to require the governor to make proper conveyance and for a partition of the lands already conveyed to the Sioux City company erroneously by the State.

Mr. INGALLS. Of certain specific lands?

Mr. SPOONER. The decree of the court below is that each company is entitled to a moiety, and the decree appoints commissioners, as is usual in such decrees, to make partition.

If the Senator from Kansas receives the impression from anything I said that the Government of the United States was a party to that litigation he misunderstood me. The proposition I make is this: I think I may safely appeal to the Senator from Iowa who faces me [Mr. ALLISON] to say if it be not true that neither the State of Iowa nor any one in Iowa has had any controversy whatever with the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company as to the construction of its road under the Iowa legislation to Sheldon.

The completion of that road in accordance with law is certified. And the point I have wished to make plain to the Senate is that the company having beyond any question completed its road in accordance with law and within the time limited by law, Iowa not raising any question, the Government of the United States ought not now by this bill to cast a cloud upon that title by directing the district attorney of the United States to involve all this land in this litigation, because the Senator from Kansas will admit that a law directing the district attorney to involve land in litigation casts a cloud upon the title. I submit to the Senate that no reason has been given why this land should be involved in this long, burdensome, and expensive litigation and kept for years out of the market.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolutions reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], from the Committee on the Judiciary, February 18.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, and I appeal to him to join me in asking the Senate to grant unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may continue the consideration of Senate bill 149 with a view of concluding it. I think it can be done in a short period of time, and that course will save the time of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the consideration of the bill may be concluded this afternoon, so as to allow me to occupy as much time as I care to occupy, and therefore I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bill shall be continued.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have some further amendments in regard to this bill which I desire to prepare and submit, and it will be more convenient to me to have the matter go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota object?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the unfinished business is before the Senate.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, for the first time in the progress of this Government its executive power is now being used as a means of assault on the characters and reputations of its citizens. I state the fact; and will not now stop to determine whether it is a result of purpose, inexperience, want of thoughtful caution, or other cause whatsoever. It is an unexpected fact; and, doubtless, it would have been expressly guarded against if the framers of the Constitution had believed such a result as we are now experiencing possible in the administration of the executive power under the provisions of that instrument as they prepared them.

The First Congress discovered several serious defects in the Constitution in respect of the personal and private rights of the citizens of the Republic and of the States composing it. This discovery induced the ten articles of amendment proposed by that Congress to the States, and assured their ratification. No one can read those several articles without being impressed by the evident earnestness of purpose of the Congress which framed them, and of the States that adopted them, to give exact and ample protection to the citizen. But it does not seem to have occurred to the framers of the original articles of the Constitution or of the amendments that it was then, or ever could be, necessary to make definite provision to shield the characters and reputations of citizens against assaults by the executive power. It was reserved for the closing years of the first century of the Republic's existence to develop the danger which attends the citizen in this regard.

That this danger should now appear is a curious political phenomenon, and the method of its appearance is quite as curious as the thing itself. That it is here at all is calculated at first contemplation to induce belief in political evolution, whatever may be our inclinations relative to doctrines advanced in support of that process of development in respect of its action in the field of life and things material. It is another evidence in support of the saying that "it is the unexpected that happens." Who could have anticipated that from the political protoplasmic presence which floated on the bosom of the national Democratic platform of 1884, and whose indefiniteness was expressed in the words, "We favor honest civil-service reform," could have been evolved a result so harmful to the character and reputation of the citizen as the practice of the present national administration? Every stage reached by the peculiar movements of this strange political evolution gave promise of a better result than we now witness and the citizen experiences.

The first stage was marked by the expression of Mr. Cleveland in his letter accepting the nomination tendered to him by the national Democratic convention. In that letter he said:

The selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment should depend upon their ascertained fitness and the value of their work, and they should be neither expected nor allowed to do questionable party service. The interests of the people will be better protected; the estimate of public labor and duty will be immensely improved; public employment will be open to all who can demonstrate their fitness to enter it; the unseemly scramble for place under the Government, with consequent importunity which embitters official life, will cease.

Here, and in these words, the protoplastic presence which floated in the platform seemed to take, in some degree, defined shape. The evolutionary process continued its movements; but its next stage was not reached until Mr. Cleveland, the candidate of his party for the great office of President of the United States, had become President-elect. When the latter character had been assured to him by everything except the counting of the electoral votes and the official announcement of the result thereof, availing himself of the glad Christmas-time, he took occasion to announce in his letter to Mr. Curtis, in language forcefully expressive, that the political evolution was going steadily and resolutely on towards those better conditions and purer practices which would assure the active presence of reform in the methods of executive action. And here is what he wrote after all of the exigencies of the campaign and uncertainties of the election were out of the way and had become things of the past. This is what he said:

That practical reform in civil service is demanded is abundantly established by the statutes referred to in your communication, and that to secure such a result it has been passed in Congress with the assent of both political parties, and by the further fact that a sentiment is generally prevalent among patriotic people calling for a fair and honest enforcement of the law which has thus been enacted. I regard myself pledged to this, because my conception of the true Democratic faith and public duty require this and all other statutes should be in good faith and without evasion enforced, and because in many utterances made prior to my election as President, approved by the party to which I belong and which I have no disposition to disclaim, I have in effect promised the people that this should be done.

* * * * * * *

There is a class of Government positions which is not within the letter of the civil-service statute, but which are not so connected with the policy of an administration that the removal therefrom of the present incumbents should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed solely on partisan grounds and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power.

These expressions marked the second stage reached by the political evolution which took its start in the protoplasmic feature of the Democratic platform of 1884. No one could doubt the marked character of the advance which it indicated. Surely, a beautiful creation must be the final result. This was the expressed belief of those who desired such a termination of the movement; and it intensified the fears of those who did not desire it.

Time moved on, and the political evolution kept pace with it. The 4th of March, 1885, was reached, and Mr. Cleveland became President of the United States in fact and in law. On that, to him, mighty occasion he gave further utterance and told the assembled people and the country that the third stage of the political evolution had been reached. All that he had theretofore said had been but the utterances of Mr. Cleveland, citizen. Now had come the time for Mr. Cleveland, President of the United States, to speak, and he did speak these words, namely:

The people demand reform in the administration of the Government, and the application of business principles to public affairs. As a means to this end, civil-service reform should be in good faith indorsed. Our citizens have the right to protection from the incompetency of public employés who hold their places solely as the reward of partisan service, and from the corrupting influence of those who promise, and the vicious methods of those who expect such rewards; and those who worthily seek public employment have the right to insist that merit and competency shall be recognized instead of party subserviency or the surrender of honest political belief.

This marked the official and highest stage of the political evolution, whose subtle forces had wrought wondrously well in elevating Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency of the United States. But he had no purpose to abandon the habit of proclaiming the doctrines of the political school to which he claimed to have committed his fortunes as candidate and President. He was not content with the announcement on the 4th of March, 1885, that the official and highest stage of the political evolution had been reached; for he renewed the declaration in his first annual message to Congress, and took care to give it great elaboration. He seemed to have most earnest desire to impress the country with the belief that the indefinite protoplasmic presence in the platform on which his party placed him at Chicago had evolved a substantial and forceful political organism, which would purify our politics and bless the country in general, and hence in that message he said:

The report of the Civil Service Commission, which will be submitted, contains an account of the manner in which the civil-service law has been executed during the last year, and much valuable information on this important subject.

I am inclined to think that there is no sentiment more general in the minds of the people of our country than a conviction of the correctness of the principle upon which the law enforcing civil-service reform is based. In its present condition the law regulates only a part of the subordinate public positions throughout the country. It applies the test of fitness to applicants for these places by means of a competitive examination, and gives large discretion to the commissioners as to the character of the examination and many other matters connected with its execution. Thus the rules and regulations adopted by the commission have much to do with the practical usefulness of the statute and with the results of its application.

The people may well trust the commission to execute the law with perfect fairness and with as little irritation as is possible. But of course no relaxation of the principle which underlies it and no weakening of the safeguards which surround it can be expected. Experience in its administration will probably suggest amendment of the methods of its execution, but I venture to hope that we shall never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards for partisan service. Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which upon every change of administration inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

The allurements of an immense number of offices and places, exhibited to the voters of the land, and the promise of their bestowal in recognition of partisan activity, debauch the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughtful and deliberative character. The evil would increase with the multiplication of offices consequent upon our extension, and the mania for office-holding, growing from its indulgence, would pervade our population so generally that patriotic purposes, the support of principle, the desire for the public good, and solicitude for the nation's welfare would be nearly banished from the activity of our party contests and cause them to degenerate into ignoble, selfish, and disgraceful struggles for the possession of office and public place.

Civil-service reform enforced by law came none too soon to check the progress of demoralization.

One of its effects, not enough regarded, is the freedom it brings to the political action of those conservative and sober men who, in fear of the confusion and risk attending an arbitrary and sudden change in all the public offices with a change of party rule, cast their ballots against such a chance.

Parties seem to be necessary, and will long continue to exist; nor can it be now denied that there are legitimate advantages, not disconnected with office-holding, which follow party supremacy. While partisanship continues bitter and pronounced, and supplies so much of motive to sentiment and action, it is not fair to hold public officials in charge of important trusts responsible for the best results in the performance of their duties, and yet insist that they shall rely, in confidential and important places, upon the work of those not only opposed to them in political affiliation, but so steeped in partisan prejudice and rancor that they have no loyalty to their chiefs and no desire for their success. Civil-service reform does not exact this, nor does it require that those in subordinate positions who fail in yielding their best service, or who are incompetent, should be retained simply because they are in place. The whining of a clerk discharged for indolence or incompetency, who, though he gained his place by the worst possible operation of the spoil system, suddenly discovers that he is entitled to protection under the sanction of civil-service reform, represents an idea no less absurd than the clamor of the applicant who claims the vacant position as his compensation for the most questionable party work.

The civil-service law does not prevent the discharge of the indolent or incompetent clerk, but it does prevent supplying his place with the unfit party worker. Thus, in both of these phases, is seen benefit to the public service. And the people who desire good government having secured this statute will not relinquish its benefits without protest. Nor are they unmindful of the fact that its full advantages can only be gained through the complete good faith of those having its execution in charge. And this they will insist upon.

These utterances of Mr. Cleveland, as Presidential candidate, President-elect, and President, contain many things which thoughtful men approve. American politics would be greatly improved if the contests which they induce could be carried on without regard to the possession or acquisition of the thousands of offices created by our laws. Eliminate this factor from the case, and let the minds of our people be given to the public questions, measures, policies, and interests with which our political activities deal, and I do not doubt that most beneficial results would follow. A belief that this would be so is entertained by many thousands and tens of thousands of our most considerate citizens. It was a knowledge of this fact that caused the Democratic party to put into its Chicago platform of 1884 that politico-protoplasmic uncertainty which said: "We favor honest civil-service reform." And it was this knowledge which impelled Mr. Cleveland as Presidential candidate, President-elect, and President to give utterance to the expressions which I have quoted from him.

The convention gave him a bad start by its meaningless expression, and so we need not wonder that he has reached a like result. The political evolution whose several stages he announced as I have indicated has not produced a new species. It has not even improved on the old one. The process did not promise anything better at the beginning, while the end has given something infinitely worse. The high-sounding phrases and generous platitudes which have been thrown around the uncertain and meaningless expression of the platform have not changed it in the least. It is the same now that it was then. It is simply a political hermit crab stowed away in an appropriated shell of that better political organism called reform. It has increased in size and has elaborated its ugliness, but its species has not changed.

Mr. President, the official and unofficial expressions which I have quoted from Mr. Cleveland as citizen and as President of the United States have not been without definite effect on the minds of the people of this country. The people have generously given him credit for sincerity. They listened to his expressions, have read them, and studied them. They have resolved a belief concerning him and his purposes in respect of the reform about which he has said so much. They appreciated the difficulties surrounding him since the 4th of March last, when he, in pursuance of his election as President of the United States, assumed the executive power of this Republic. They could not always reconcile his action in the matter of suspending competent and faithful public officers with his repeated utterance that such things would not be done by him. He had said to them and to the country, in substance and effect, that public officers holding their places for fixed and definite terms would not be removed for partisan reasons, but only for cause. They believed that he meant what he said. They gave him credit for being a man who had the courage of his convictions. This resulted in a universal belief that charges other than political must be lodged against a public officer before his suspension could be had.

This being the case, it logically followed that whenever an officer was suspended he believed, and the people believed, that some grave charge or charges had been made against him. Indeed, every suspended officer was, by the President's own declarations, made to stand before the country as unworthy of trust or confidence. How could it be otherwise when the President, who alone could make the suspension, had enforced a universal belief that he would not do it except for cause? If this be not a necessary conclusion, then what must be the estimation placed by the people on the word of a President? And if it be a correct idea, what must be the President's idea of fair dealing with the citizen? He has suspended six hundred and forty-three public officers and marshaled them before the country as persons unworthy of trust or confidence. Many of them have requested to be informed of the nature of the charges made against them. This has been denied them, and in this way, as I remarked at the outset, the executive power is being used as a means of assault against the characters and reputations of the cit izens of the Republic. No such outrage as this has been inflicted on the citizens of this country from the first year of our national existence until the incoming of the present administration, its pomp and circumstance of reform to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is a most extraordinary manifestation of reform for the President to place himself before the country as the accuser of the six hundred and forty-three public officers he has suspended, and at the same time deny to them information in respect of the things of which they are accused. If he had said to them, "You are Republicans and I want your places in order that I may confer them on Democrats; hence, if you do not resign I will suspend you and designate Democrats to discharge the duties of the offices which you hold," he would have dealt frankly with them and manifested a manliness which would have challenged respect. But he has said no such thing. On the contrary, he has said quite the opposite, as I have shown in my quotations from his unofficial and official declarations. Hence I repeat that he stands before the country as the accuser of every officer he has suspended, and he asks the Senate to join him in his accusations; and when this body requests to be informed concerning the official and personal conduct of the accused officer, the President, through the heads of the several Departments, flatly tells it that no information will be given. He asks the Senate to become a party to the abuse of the executive power in its assault on the character and reputation of the citizen who may chance to hold an office on the ground that it is his right to so use his discretion regardless of its effect on the citizen or of the responsibility of this body in the matter of the advice and consent which it may give. This is not the warrant of the Constitution. It is contrary to both the theory and the practice of the Government from its beginning to the present time. The President by his own acts and declarations has made his case an exception to all others.

Mr. President, is the demand of the Senate to be informed concerning the subject about which it is to advise and consent unlawful, or even unreasonable? What is the law in this regard? Section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, under which all of the suspensions of officers by the President have been made, says:

> During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except judges of the courts of the United States, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed, in his discretion, by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time. * * * The President shall, within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to the same session of the Senate for the office

What does this mean? Who may exercise the discretion here declared? Not Grover Cleveland, but the President. Grover Cleveland is a person. The President is an officer. The discretion delegated is not a personal discretion. If it were it might be exercised by Grover Cleveland. It is an official discretion, and can only be exercised by the President. The President acts for the organized Government. He occupies a public office; and he has said that "a public office is a public trust." Grover Cleveland may act capriciously and to his own hurt. He may do this in a thousand ways, and be responsible only to himself. The President may not so act. He must act as the law ordains. Caprice is not a part of the law. Official discretion must act for lawful purposes in lawful ways. It may not rightly act from personal motives, nor yet for mere partisan ends. Its movements must be induced by public causes. Hence Grover Cleveland may not suspend from office a civil officer in his personal discretion. The President may do so in his official discretion. What does this imply? Why, that some cause connected with the public good must impel him to act. It is this which vitalizes official discretion. Official discretion is hedged about by law, recognized customs, long practices, and established methods. Not that the latter three conditions may not be modified by official discretion; but that in such case there must be some good and sufficient reason evolved by public consideration for such change.

The President has overlooked or disregarded this rule of official action. The difficulty which surrounds this subject in the present juncture arises from the failure of the President and his advisers to keep in mind the distinction which marks the difference between the individual and the public officer. He and they seem to have confounded personal caprice and official discretion. Hence we need not wonder when, now and then, we hear his supporters speaking of the President's "prerogative," and affirming that it may not be encroached upon. This kingly phrase, which implies that the President may not be questioned or held responsible or accountable for whatsoever he may do in the exercise of his discretion, even though his act may be unlawful, gives tone, and character, and definition to the new order of things which has fallen upon this country in respect of the administration of its executive power.

The outraged citizen who stands arraigned before the country by the President as a person unworthy of confidence and unfit to hold a public office may not inquire concerning the charges made against him, for this is an encroachment on the kingly prerogative of the possessor of the executive power; and if the Senate, when called upon by the President to give its approving advice and consent to his assault on the character and reputation of the citizen, makes request to the head of the proper Executive Department for information embraced in the official files of the Government, in order that common justice, fair play, and opportunity for explanation or defense may be allowed to enter the case, it is coolly told that—

> The President of the United States directs me to say * * * that it is not considered that the public interests will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Thus the assumed kingly prerogative of the President places under lock and key the public records of the country, and denies the information which they contain, even in confidence, to the Senate, notwithstanding the President is, at the same time, asking it to advise and consent to a consummation of the assault, implied from his own professions of reform, which he has made on the character and reputation of the citizen concerned.

Mr. President, if this be reform then the sooner we return to old methods and practices the better. No such thing was dreamed of in the early days of the Government. The Union had but just been formed when, as I have already stated, defects were discovered in respect of the insufficient protection afforded by the Constitution concerning the private rights of the citizen, and this moved the First Congress to propose the ten amendments to the States. Turn to the first of those ten amendments and see how they are almost wholly made up of provisions for the better protection of the citizen in his private and personal rights, and among these several amendments how imperially stands the sixth article. I here quote it in its forceful directness and definite affirmations. It reads as follows, namely:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

This is the rule of fair play which the Constitution interposes between the citizen and the great judicial power which that instrument ordained and established. In it is formulated the jealous care of the Government for the citizen. Nor does it recognize distinctions of wealth, or place, or power, or fame. Be he high or low, rich or poor, known to fame or incased in obscurity, this constitutional shield is over him, and its protection is around and about him. No matter what may be the grade of crime to him imputed, whether the gravest known to the law or the most insignificant found in its definitions, he is entitled to enjoy all of the protective forces organized by this imperial article of the Constitution. It is a superb monument marking the place where our fathers buried the star-chamber practices which charged, tried, and condemned men without notice or hearing.

It does not seem to have occurred to the wise and patriotic men who formulated the first ten amendments to the Constitution that there could exist among the possibilities of our governmental movements such a thing as an organized and irresponsible assault on the characters and reputations of citizens. Hence, when they had provided that "no person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," and surrounded this declaration with the protective affirmations and negations which ennoble and beautify our Constitution, they rested in the belief that all had been done for the defense of the rights of the citizen that any exigency could require. They felt that in all of the respects mentioned the judicial power was so surrounded by lines of conservative limitations that the citizen would forever be secure in his rights of whatsoever kind. They knew that all of the protective provisions and defensive limitations that the Constitution ordained for the security of the citizen and his rights applied to both the legislative and judicial powers, and could not have suspected that there was lurking danger in that other factor of government which appears in the words:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

Much less could they have suspected that this power would ever be perverted to the office of assaulting the character and reputation of the citizen, and that, too, without affording him opportunity of answer, defense, or explanation. How could they have suspected this when it has required nearly a century of political activity to disclose the possible presence of such a danger? Was not the Government ordained to "establish justice;" and was not all done that the most cautious could suggest to assure that this end should be realized? Let the ninety-seven years that have passed since the adoption of the Constitution give answer to these questions.

I do not appeal to those years because their records are those of uniform manifestations of brotherly love and wholly free from factional strife and partisan bitterness. We know that their pages contain no such beautiful story, but we also know that from the 4th of March, 1789, on down to the 4th of March, 1885, they tell no such story of the exercise of executive power in assault on the good name of the citizen as this country is now experiencing. They do disclose most resolute and embittered conflicts of political parties, and on their pages are recorded relentless strifes of the contending organizations. No one can review the history of those years without learning that it unfolds many events that mar our political movements and show how, oftentimes, zeal for party dominated the better judgments of men.

Cruel assaults upon the characters and reputations of public men frequently appear, but they disclose the negative virtue of having been openly made, and hence gave opportunity for defense. Free use was made of the power of removal from and appointment to office. On many of the banners gathered from the fields of political contests of those years are found the inscription, "To the victors belong the spoils." And the record shows that the spoils were freely and openly appropriated. Nor did the successful party deem it necessary to malign its defeated opponents in order to dismiss them from office and put its members in possession. And about all of this, bad as much of it doubtless was, there was a sort of open-faced manliness that commands respect if it does not induce approval.

There was no departure from the sturdy rule of common justice and worshipful fair-play which assured the citizen a hearing, and gave him opportunity of defense. Nor did the present national administration start on its course in opposition to that rule. On the contrary, it proclaimed its knowledge of the abuses of the past and its determination to correct them through the methods of reform so often projected upon the attention of the country. The utterances of the President were against his present practice, and no less than three members of his Cabinet were fully, personally and officially, committed in opposition to the doctrine contained in the letter of the Attorney-General which occasioned the report and resolutions presented to this body by its Committee on the Judiciary, and which we are now considering. From that report I quote a paragraph, as follows, namely:

> Since the passage of the act of 2d March, 1867, "regarding the tenure of certain civil offices," it has been the practice of the Committee on the Judiciary, whenever a nomination has been made proposing the removal from office of one person and the appointment of another, to address a note to the head of the Department having such matters in charge (usually the Attorney-General) asking that all papers and information in the possession of the Department touching the conduct and administration of the officer proposed to be removed, and touching the character and conduct of the person proposed to be appointed, be sent to the committee for its information. This practice has through all administrations been carried on with the unanimous approval of all the members of the committee, although the composition of the committee has been during this period sometimes of one political character and sometimes of another. In no instance, until this time, has the committee met with any delay or denial in respect of furnishing such papers and information, with a single exception, and in which exception the delay and suggested denial lasted for only two or three days.

Three members of the Cabinet of President Cleveland stepped from positions on the Judiciary Committee of the Senate into the places they now occupy. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General had, each and all, as stated in the report now under consideration, approved and participated in the practice of calling upon the executive department of the Government for just such character of information as is now, by direction of the President, denied to the Senate. We are bound to assume that these three members of the President's Cabinet believed that it was proper for the committee of which they were members to call for information deemed necessary to its enlightenment in the discharge of its duties, and it is difficult now to understand how they can consistently support the President in his direction to them not to furnish to the Senate itself such character of information as they by their official action affirmed it was the right of one of its committees to request and obtain. The other members of the Cabinet are inexperienced in such affairs, or doubtless they too might be quoted in approval of the opinions and actions of their associates when members of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body. Indeed, it would be unreasonable to expect to find them in occupancy of any other position if they had had experience into which we could look for definition of their opinions.

Mr. President, the uniform and unbroken practice of the Government in respect of the question which the pending report presents is against the denial of information with which the President, through the letter of the Attorney-General, confronts the Senate and obstructs its customary methods of action. I do not except a single administration from this statement. On the contrary I include even the present one; for as I read its movements in the light of the public information which defines them, its present attitude is the result of an afterthought. Its chief, both as candidate and President, had protested too much in respect of civil-service reform and improved methods in the manipulation of public patronage to suit the purposes of his partisan supporters. They could keep silence when the candidate defined his views, for then the need was votes. But when as President he continued his protestations the silence was broken, for then they wanted the offices.

It is not necessary that I shall challenge the sincerity of the President in respect of the declarations made by him both before and after his election. I am quite willing to admit that his-oft-repeated purpose to enforce reform gave way to the resolute pressure of his partisan supporters rather than because they were meaningless when uttered. And so I do not complain that his acts in the respect mentioned do not conform to his professions, but rather of the means and methods by which the change was effected. Were it not for this feature of the case the present conflict between the President and this body, in all probability, would not have transpired; for the issue joined does not invite discussion of the President's power to remove or suspend public officers, as he, in his recent communication to the Senate, and some of his defenders would have the public believe. The issue now joined on the basis of the resolutions reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is quite different in its nature, and is by them defined as follows, namely:

> Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.
> Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.
>
> Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—
>
> "That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office"—
> ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach and to give place to another who has not rendered such service is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

It requires no argument to demonstrate that had the President practiced his reform declarations it is not probable the occasion would have transpired for the formulation of these resolutions. The attempt to invent a method of surrender to partisan pressure, while at the same time proclaiming the shibboleth of reform, brought upon the administration its present predicament and projected the pending issue into our political affairs, and in this feature of the case we again have impressed upon us the truth of the doctrine that it is never quite safe to do wrong.

Mr. President, what was the method invented for the surrender of the professed reform purposes of the administration to the pressure of partisan demands? Simply the star-chamber method of inviting assaults upon the characters and reputations or the personal or official conduct of officers, and denying to them knowledge of the nature of the charges presented and refusing opportunity for answer thereto. It was a simple process, but it was a wrong one. It answered the purpose of the surrender, but it brought a harvest of trouble to its inventors; for those who availed themselves of it acted with singular lack of discrimination, and this, in my judgment, had more to do with inducing the resolution not to comply with the Senate's requests for papers and information in the cases of suspension from office than any question of constitutional law that has been obtruded in justification of such course.

Papers and information called for by at least one committee of the Senate, in the usual course of procedure in such cases, had been supplied, without protest or delay, by the head of the Department addressed, and many of the files so supplied in respect of the charges presented against the officers suspended, and in support of the applications of the persons nominated to the Senate, are still in possession of that committee awaiting final reports to the Senate on the cases to which they refer. It will also be remembered that the President as late as about the 3d of January last gave very definite expression of his purpose not to be plagued with the possession of secrets. It is true that this was not in form of an official document; but I am advised that the words which I shall quote as his went to the public with his approval. They appeared in the New York World of the 4th of January last, and are as follows, namely:

If there ever was an administration that has no secrets, this is one. I want the business of this administration to be done behind glass doors.

This was courageous, and the country applauded it. But it did not last. Indeed quite an opposite purpose was announced. Papers, documents, records, information, of kind and character never before denied to the Senate or its committees, were converted into administration secrets, and doors of resolute refusal were substituted for those of glass behind which the business of this administration was to be done. Something had gone wrong. The administration had suddenly become weighted down with secrets. The efforts to avoid the force and obligation of the reform pronunciamentoes which I have already quoted had filled the official files of the several Departments with a mass of unpleasant political wares that would not look well behind glass doors, and so the curtains were pulled down, and all concerned were told by the letter of the Attorney-General, sent in response to the resolution of the Senate, that—

The President of the United States directs me to say * * * that the public interest will not be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

And what were these dreadful papers and documents that the Senate had called for? Let the resolution by which the call was made give the answer. Here it is, namely:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

It will hardly be claimed that there is anything in this mildly-phrased resolution that it should have frightened the administration into an abandonment of its glass doors. But it seems to have had that effect. Only three weeks had passed after the President's no-secrets and glass-doors proclamation had gone to the country when the Senate adopted that resolution. What occasioned its adoption? Why, during the recess of the Senate the President had suspended George M. Duskin from the office of United States district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, and designated John D. Burnett to discharge the duties thereof. Soon after the Senate met in December last, Burnett's name was sent in and this body was asked to advise and consent to his appointment in the place of Duskin, suspended. As this is a case of suspension it is quite as important for the Senate to be advised with respect of the suspended officer and his management and conduct of the office as it is for it to be informed concerning the character and qualifications of the person nominated by the President; for if the Senate should fail or refuse to advise and consent to the appointment of the latter, the former remains an officer, and is entitled to enter upon and discharge the duties of the office, unless in the mean time, for other cause than suspension, his right to the office had ceased. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Embry vs. United States, 100 United States Reports, 680, sustains this position. The opinion was delivered by the Chief-Justice, and there was no dissent by other member of the court. From the opinion I quote as follows, namely:

When Embry was appointed, the President had the power to suspend him for cause. The law also provided that if suspended he should draw no salary so long as another person was performing his duties. While he was in office, further power of suspension was given the President, with a like provision as to pay. He was suspended. The Senate did not see fit to advise or consent to the appointment of another person in his place, and consequently, on the 15th of July, 1870, when the next session of the Senate ended, he became entitled to enter again on the performance of the duties which pertained to his office. This he did on the 27th of July, but not before.

Embry was suspended under the same law that applies to the case of Duskin. The same result may be reached in Duskin's case or in any other case of suspension as transpired in that of Embry. If the Senate should fail or refuse to advise and consent to the appointment of Burnett, who has been nominated to the office from which Duskin was suspended, the latter will, in the language used by the Supreme Court, be "entitled to enter again on the performance of the duties which pertain to his office." Hence it is all important that the Senate should have the information called for by the resolution of January 25, 1886. It is true that, if the Senate should reject Burnett, or adjourn without acting on his case, the President may again suspend Duskin. But suppose he should not do so, what then? Why Duskin remains in office, and in view of the law and the possible fact the President instructs the Attorney-General to say to the Senate in reply to its resolution that—

It is not considered that the public interests will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Mr. President, we must look elsewhere than in the field of public interest for the true reason for this most extraordinary position of this administration. The President in this particular respect has enlarged upon the blunder which led him to confound personal discretion with that of an official character, as I have heretofore explained. He now confounds the public interest with the partisan interest of his administration. He seems to have forgotten that "a public office is a public trust," and so treats it as created for personal ends and partisan advantage. Hence, he directs his Cabinet officers to deny to the Senate the character of information it has been accustomed to receive in response to its directions to them from the foundation of the Government on down to the month of January, 1886.

What are these personal ends and partisan advantages? They are not to be found in the field of the public interest. Then what and where are they? They are the possession of the public offices in violation of the reform professions which have been so freely given out to the country by resort to the questionable methods that have crammed the official files of the several Departments with charges against officials and citizens so unfounded, unscrupulous, and unsavory that the administration has become frightened at the results its unexampled scheme has produced. The administration has discovered that it has secrets, and glass doors are no longer used. Its manipulation of official patronage, in violation of its own declarations in favor of better methods, has made it the custodian of official files which it has not the courage to disclose. The President directs his Cabinet officers to withhold them from the committees of the Senate and from the Senate itself, and elects to take the alternative of standing before the country as the public accuser of every citizen suspended from office. The legend "no secrets here" is taken down from its place above the "glass doors" of the abode of the administration, and the public official files are stowed away in dark closets under lock and key, all in the name of reform and the public interest.

Mr. President, this course of procedure is not in accord with either the recognized principles or the established practice of our Government. It is an abuse of the executive power which has no justification in our history. It is a movement toward centralization which finds no support in the Constitution. The country will not support it. Some of the President's most efficient supporters in his candidacy for the office which he now holds have pronounced against the position he has assumed. I recently received by mail a circular letter which shows how some of the men whose support aided greatly in the election of the President, and who, in common with many others, believe and affirm that their efforts assured his success, have come to regard his present attitude relative to the question presented by the report now under consideration. I quote the heading of the circular and a part of its contents, as follows, namely:

NATIONAL CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE,
Office, 4 Pine Street.

George William Curtis, President.
William Potts, Secretary.
Executive Committee.—Moorfield Storey, Boston; Morrill Wyman, jr., Cambridge; W. W. Montgomery, Philadelphia; J. Hall Pleasants, Baltimore; Sherman S. Rogers, Buffalo; William W. Aiken, Norwich; Edward M. Shepard, William Carey Sanger, Brooklyn; John Jay, Carl Schurz, Everett P. Wheeler, Silas W. Burt, A. R. Macdonough, George William Curtis, Frederic W. Whitridge, New York.

NEW YORK, February 19, 1886.

The following resolutions were adopted at a meeting of the National Civil-service Reform League, held in New York city on Tuesday, February 19, 1886:

"Whereas publicity in all matters connected with appointments to and removals from office would serve to discourage the use of public offices for mere partisan purposes, and therefore greatly advance the reform of the public service: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the National Civil Service Reform League recommend

* * * * * * * *

"Third. The practical recognition of the principle that recommendations for office as well as the representation of reasons for the removal of officers, addressed to the appointing and removing power, are acts affecting the public interest which should not escape responsibility, and that therefore such recommendations or representations should be regarded and treated, not as private and confidential communications, but as part of the public record."

Some of the names that here appear have gone to the verge of consistency in excusing many of the acts of the President which have conflicted with their avowed principles. But they can not approve of his determination not to give information concerning the acts which have joined an issue between him and the Senate. They can not agree that the character and reputation of the public officer and citizen may be attacked by masked political batteries, firing charges manufactured, it may be by mere greed of office, or it may be by personal malice, or reckless disregard of the good name of the victim, without opportunity of defense. Nor can they agree that the public records comprising the official files of the Executive Departments of the Government may be converted into the private and confidential possessions of the President, to be used by him in disregard of that fundamental principle of the Constitution which affirms the right of the citizen to be informed of accusations against him and of opportunity to make defense. Nor will the people of this country approve such assumptions. They have been too long and too thoroughly educated in doctrines of fair play and even-handed justice to consent to a reversal of the principles, tradition, and practices of the Government in these regards.

The "plain people," as President Lincoln was accustomed to call them, will readily detect that the issue pending between the President and the Senate is in no right sense a partisan contention. They will have no difficulty in coming to a resolution of this issue. They will readily see that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary presents no such miserable partisan issue as would be involved in a mere contention about office-holding. They will not fail to see that the contest is one which involves the integrity of the public records, as they are contained in the official files of the several Departments, and against that partial mutilation of them consisting of withholding portions thereof from proper inspection in connection with the discharge of official duties by the Senate, the House of Representatives, and their respective committees, when enlightened performance of their respective duties may so require, and that it means the preservation of those proper, lawful, constitutional methods which have been observed from the beginning of the Government to the present time.

Evidences tending to show that the country is now taking this view of the case are multiplying every day, and in all directions. The number of leading journals, to say nothing of those of lesser note, all of which are included in the Democratic press of the country, and now join in condemning the action of the administration in denying the information, documents and papers called for by the Senate, is a forceful indication of the drift of public sentiment. The star chamber method of procedure will never be approved by the people of this country. Any administration that insists upon its establishment will be execrated by the people, for partisan zeal can not outlive that devotion to fair play, exact justice, frank methods, and conservative regard for the rights of the citizen which is characteristic of our people.

This view of the case seems to be impressing itself on the mind of the President. On no other hypothesis can I account for the extraordinary communication he sent to the Senate on the 1st instant. I call it extraordinary because it is entirely foreign to any duty devolved on the President by the Constitution in respect of the relations existing between the executive and legislative departments of the Government. In this regard the Constitution says concerning the duties of the President:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

There is nothing in this language which suggests the sending to the Senate of such a communication as that read from the Secretary's desk on the 1st instant. But as many strange things are transpiring in these days it may be an indication that a new departure is about to transpire in the movements of the executive department of the Government. It may be an indication of the purpose of the President, when any measure is pending in the Senate, and for or against which he may desire to express his views, to send to this body an elaborated formulation of his opinions and have the same read from the desk of the Secretary for the enlightenment of whomsoever will give ear thereto. And if this should prove to be the case it would not be more singular in its character than the declaration of the President, in his communication of the 1st instant, relative to the papers and documents on the official files of the Departments, wherein he says:

I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control. I suppose if I desired to take them into my custody I might do so with entire propriety, and if I saw fit to destroy them no one could complain.

This is a most pronounced confounding of the individual and the public officer. It is, probably, the most definite assertion of personalism in our Government that has ever been pronounced by a President of the United States; and it shows how apt one wrong step to lead to another. Having adopted a policy that has filled the official files of the several Departments with a mass of papers which would not look well behind glass doors, what more natural result could follow than the thought that rather than disclose them they will be taken away and destroyed? The papers and documents in most, if not all, instances, I deem it safe to say, carry either official indorsements of departmental officers or clerks or file-stamps on them, and are part of the public records, so recognized in the official briefs of subjects to which they relate, and protected as such by penal sanctions in laws enacted by Congress. Two sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States are instructive in this regard. They are as follows, namely:

SEC. 5403. Every person who willfully destroys or attempts to destroy, or, with intent to steal or destroy, takes and carries away any record, paper, or proceeding of a court of justice, filed or deposited with any clerk or officer of such court, or any paper, or document, or record filed or deposited in any public office, or with any judicial or public officer, shall, without reference to the value of the record, paper, document, or proceeding so taken, pay a fine of not more than $2,000, or suffer imprisonment, at hard labor, not more than three years, or both.

SEC. 5408. Every officer, having the custody of any record, document, paper, or proceeding specified in section 5403, who fraudulently takes away, or withdraws, or destroys any such record, document, paper, or proceeding filed in his office or deposited with him or in his custody, shall pay a fine of not more than $2,000, or suffer imprisonment at hard labor not more than three years, or both; and shall, moreover, forfeit his office and be forever afterward disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States.

Could there be any more emphatic declaration than these sections contain that papers and documents once placed in the public files are to remain there as parts thereof? When "filed or deposited in any public office or with any judicial or public officer" they become part of the public records, and are no longer the personal possessions of the President, or of any other public officer, or of any other person whomsoever. Neither the law, the uniform practice of the Government, nor anything in our history justifies the President's assertion of personal ownership of such papers and documents.

But this assumed ownership of papers and documents which have become parts of the official files of the Government, is not the only assertion of personalism that occurs in the remarkable communication sent to this body by the President. He assumes that to him alone belongs the power to remove public officers from office. He says:

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Mr. President, let us see about this. Let us apply to it the test of the Constitution itself:

He shall nominate, and by and with the consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

This is an express delegation of affirmative power. To whom? To the President and the Senate. He may nominate officers, but he can not appoint them except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There is no power to remove public officers delegated to any one by express terms of the Constitution. It is not given to the President, nor to the Senate, nor to both combined by express terms. But the power exists. This is admitted by all. But if not by express provision of the Constitution, then how does it come to exist at all? Why, by implication. If by implication, where must it lodge? Why, just where the express power exists. Where is that? In the President and the Senate. Hence, the assumption that the President alone possesses the power of removal is another assertion of personalism which has no justification in the Constitution, and the President himself admits, by his acts, that he gets his power to suspend officers from a law enacted by Congress; for every one of his six hundred and forty-three suspensions has been made under section 1768 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And he so states in the nominations.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, as the Senator from Vermont says, it is a fact which he states in each and every one of the nominations sent in in cases of suspension.

It would not be difficult, Mr. President, to point out many other positions advanced in the communication sent to the Senate equally as unfounded as those I have mentioned. How could we expect better of a document which rests on no surer foundation than a mistake of fact? And is not this the predicament of the one sent to us by the President? The first sentence of the communication contains a misstatement of the action of the Senate. The mistake which it contains is the pivot on which turns no inconsiderable part of the entire communication. Indeed, if the President had not made this mistake the paper would have presented no semblance of a reason for its preparation. Here is the assertion with which he started out:

Ever since the beginning of the present session of the Senate the different heads of the Departments attached to the executive branch of the Government have been plied with various requests and demands from committees of the Senate, from members of such committees, and at last from the Senate itself, requiring the transmission of reasons for the suspension of certain officials during the recess of that body.

Every member of this body knows that the Senate has sent no request or demand to any one "requiring the transmission of reasons for the suspension of certain officials during the recess of that body." The resolution of the Senate absolutely negatives this mistake of the President. I have quoted the resolution at length in the early part of my remarks and, therefore, need not to repeat it here; but I can not refrain from expressing my surprise that the President did not recognize the marked difference between the language and form of that resolution and the statement on which he predicated his communication to this body.

Mr. President, I am done with the political Comedy of Errors which the present national administration has been enacting during the twelve months of its existence in respect of its observance of its promises to introduce better methods into the management of public affairs. I sincerely wish it had done better than it has. I trust and believe that my regard for the general welfare of the country will never allow me to rejoice in the blunders or misdeeds tending to its hurt of this or any other administration however much they may promise in the way of advantage to the party organization to which I belong. But I am free to say that the present case is one of no little discouragement when considered in the light of the much that it promised and the little it has performed.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from West Virginia will permit me to make a suggestion. If he does not feel like going on to-night, with the effect of detaining the Senate here somewhat late, I will make a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill which I think will be acceptable.

Mr. KENNA. To consult my own personal convenience I could go on now, but it would be utterly impossible that I should even hope to get through this evening. Therefore, if it suits the purpose of the Senator from Kansas, I am very glad to yield to his suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to suggest to my friend from Kansas that instead of making a motion he ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the pending resolutions be informally laid aside, and then he can ask the Senate to proceed to whatever he may desire.

Mr. PLUMB. I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Kansas refers to the bill which was under discussion this morning he knows, I suppose, at any rate I will now make it known to him, that I am opposed to that bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it was proper that I should say that to the Senator.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator has stated it before.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say that I desire to move an amendment to the bill, which I should have had ready if I had supposed it was to go on this afternoon; but as I supposed it was not going on until morning, I am not quite ready.

Mr. PLUMB. I presume that there will be some discussion on the amendment now pending, and there will be ample time for the Senator to prepare his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I rather think not.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say further, as an excuse for whatever insistance I may make now that the Senate shall go on with the bill, that I have given notice here repeatedly. For two months the bill has been on the Calendar, almost from the very first day when the Calendar was formed, the Calendar number being 30, and if the ingenuity which my friend from Massachusetts possesses had been exercised during all that period of time he could have drawn up his amendment I think before now.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator would, I am quite sure, not think it just to take up a bill unexpectedly out of its order and displace the regular order of the Senate at this hour of the afternoon under these circumstances—a bill which in order will be up unquestionably to-morrow morning.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the pending resolutions be laid aside informally in order that I may move to take up the bill which I have indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that in the present condition of things, when one of our number lies unburied, dead to our great grief, I do not feel disposed to press a final conclusion of the matter under consideration. But I wish to say, keeping it so that it shall be considered until it is ended, right or wrong, that at the beginning of next week I shall ask the Senate to stick to this business, and not stop at one speech a day but go on and finish it, and so go on to other affairs.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the Senator from Vermont does not understand me as asking for a postponement of the pending matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. KENNA. I am perfectly willing to proceed now, or I can wait until to-morrow, which would be very much better, I think. I do not ask for any delay whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the matter being laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the request of the Senator from Kansas, the Chair feels it to be his duty to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS VETO MESSAGE.

The message was laid before the Senate and read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith, without approval, and with a statement of my objections thereto, Senate bill No. 150, entitled "An act to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes."

This proposed legislation grows out of a grant of land made to the Territory of Iowa in the year 1846 to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines River.

The language of this grant was such that it gave rise to conflicting decisions on the part of the Government Departments as to its extent, and it was not until 1860 that this question was authoritatively and finally settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its decision diminished the extent of the grant to a quantity much less than had been insisted on by certain interested parties, and rendered invalid the titles of parties who held, under the Territory or State of Iowa, lands beyond the limit of the grant fixed by the decision of the court.

For the purpose of validating such titles and to settle all disputes so far as the General Government was concerned, the Congress, in the year 1861, by a joint resolution, transferred to the State of Iowa all the title then retained by the United States to the lands within the larger limits which had been claimed, and then held by bona fide purchasers from the State; and in 1862 an act of Congress was passed for the same general purpose.

Without detailing the exact language of this resolution and statute, it certainly seems to be such a transfer and relinquishment of all interests in the land mentioned on the part of the United States as to relieve the Government from any further concern therein.

The questions unfortunately growing out of this grant and the legislation relating thereto have been passed upon by the United States Supreme Court in numerous cases; and as late as 1883 that court, referring to its many previous decisions, adjudged:

"That the act of 1862 (C. 161, 12 Stats., 543) transferred the title from the United States and vested it in the State of Iowa, for the use of its grantees under the river grant."

Bills similar to this have been before Congress for a number of years, and have failed of passage; and at least on one occasion the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate reported adversely upon a measure covering the same ground.

I have carefully examined the legislation upon the subject of this grant, and studied the decisions of the court upon the numerous and complicated questions which have arisen from such legislation, and the positions of the parties claiming an interest in the land covered by said grant; and I can not but think that every possible question that can be raised, or at least that ought to be raised, in any suit relating to these lands, has been determined by the highest judicial authority in the land. And if any substantial point remains yet unsettled, I believe there is no difficulty in presenting it to the proper tribunal.

This bill declares that certain lands which, nearly twenty-four years ago, the United States entirely relinquished are still public lands, and directs the Attorney-General to begin suits to assert and protect the title of the United States in such lands.

If it be true that these are public lands, the declaration that they are so by enactment is entirely unnecessary; and if they are wrongfully withheld from the Government, the duty and authority of the Attorney-General are not aided by the proposed legislation. If they are not public lands because the United States have conveyed them to others, the bill is subject to grave objections as an attempt to destroy vested rights and disturb interests which have long since become fixed.

If a law of Congress could, in the manner contemplated by the bill, change, under the Constitution, the existing rights of any of the parties claiming interests in these lands, it hardly seems that any new questions could be presented to the courts which would do more than raise false hopes and renew useless and bitter strife and litigation.

It seems to me that all controversies which can hereafter arise between those claiming these lands have been fairly remitted to the State of Iowa, and that there they can be properly and safely left; and the Government, through its Attorney-General, should not be called upon to litigate the rights of private parties.

It is not pleasant to contemplate loss threatened to any party acting in good faith, caused by uncertainty in the language of laws or their conflicting interpretation; and if there are persons occupying these lands who labor under such disabilities as prevent them from appealing to the courts for a redress of their wrongs, a plain statute, directed simply to a remedy for such disabilities, would not be objectionable.

Should there be meritorious cases of hardship and loss, caused by an invitation on the part of the Government to settle upon lands apparently public, but to which no right nor lawful possession can be secured, it would be better, rather than to attempt a disturbance of titles already settled, to ascertain such losses and do equity by compensating the proper parties through an appropriation for that purpose.

A law to accomplish this very object was passed by Congress in the year 1873. Valuable proof is thus furnished by the only law ever passed upon the subject of the manner in which it was thought proper by the Congress at that time to meet the difficulties suggested by the bill now under consideration.

Notwithstanding the fact that there may be parties in the occupancy of these lands who suffer hardship by the application of strict legal principles to their claims, safety lies in the non-interference by Congress with matters which should be left to judicial cognizance; and I am unwilling to concur in legislation which, if not an encroachment upon judicial power, trenches so closely thereon as to be of doubtful expediency, and which at the same time increases the elements of litigation that have heretofore existed and endangers vested rights.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 11, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and laid on the table, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 5552) for the relief of James Cain; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a series of resolutions at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from California.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MILLER, and that as a mark of respect entertained by the Senate for his memory, his remains be removed from Washington to California in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate the foregoing resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously; and Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. FRYE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. GRAY were appointed as the committee under the second resolution.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLAN. When that bill went over this morning I thought the whole day would be consumed in the discussion of the resolutions reported from the Judiciary Committee, and I am not prepared with some amendments that I wish to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota object?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary invite the House of Representatives to attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California, in the Senate Chamber, on Saturday, March 13, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That invitation be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief-Justice and the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the diplomatic corps, to attend the funeral ceremony of JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California, in the Senate Chamber, on Saturday, the 13th of March, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Alexander A. Davidson, at Seymour, Jackson County, Indiana.

Nathaniel S. Bates, at Rensselaer, Jasper County, Indiana.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OMAHA INDIANS IN NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 5th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill, prepared in the Office of Indian Affairs, "for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska."

The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 10, 1886.

REPORT OF BOARD OF HEALTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress the report of the National Board of Health for the year 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 10, 1886.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an additional estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation for the Signal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD MURRAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with accompanying papers, the petition of Richard Murray, private, band Seventh Infantry, praying relief from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENCROACHMENTS OF MISSOURI RIVER AT FORT LEAVENWORTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports and maps showing encroachments of the Missouri River upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates from the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy of appropriations for the support of the academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. SAWYER for one week, on account of the death of his daughter.

JAMES CAIN.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5552) for the relief of James Cain, and to bring it before the House for immediate consideration. The bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to change the record of James Cain, late a captain in the One hundred and fifty-eighth Regiment of Infantry, New York State Volunteers, and to grant to him an honorable discharge, with the rank held by him at the time his connection with the service was severed: Provided, That such change of record does not involve any claim for pay or services from the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think there should be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. VIELE. I shall make a very brief statement to the House of the facts in this case, which are in themselves very simple. Mr. James Cain, now a prominent citizen of the State of New York, was an officer in the United States service, mustered in on the 25th of September, 1863, as a captain in the One hundred and fifth-eighth New York Regiment of Volunteers. He was promoted to that position from that of first lieutenant. While he was a first lieutenant he received a leave of absence of twenty-five days, during which period he was taken sick with malarial fever contracted in the line of his duty. He was detained eight days over the time of his leave and reported to his regiment, when he found an order had been published by the commanding general requiring that in all such cases the certificate of a regular Army surgeon should be obtained. He had the certificate of his family physician. Not having the other certificate, he was charged with being absent without leave, was court-martialed, and sentenced to be dismissed from the service. The sentence was so far beyond the offense, if offense there was any, that he might with equal justice have been sentenced to be shot. It is now asked, simply as an act of justice, that, without expense to the Government, he be rehabilitated and restored to the rights be held before that action. The committee are unanimous on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Before this bill is ordered to be engrossed and read a third time the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VIELE] to the fact that the name of the beneficiary is spelled one way in the bill and another way in the report.

Mr. VIELE. The form in which the name appears in the bill, "Cain," is the form in which it stands on the muster-roll.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VIELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDNANCE-SHOP, WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 8, 1886.

Mr. SOWDEN submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to furnish to the House of Representatives a statement showing the amount of money expended in the ordnance-shop at the Washington navy-yard for materials, wages, and tools, and the number of guns made, altered, and repaired, and their kinds and sizes; the number of cartridges, their sizes and kinds, purchased; the price paid for the same; the date of purchase, and from whom purchased, from March 1, 1882, to February 28, 1886."

The Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department report back the accompanying resolution with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SOWDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMSHIP CAROLINE MILLER.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] objected, under a misapprehension, to taking up the bill granting an American register to the steamship Caroline Miller. He did not know that it was on the Private Calendar. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered as in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Caroline Miller, owned at the port of Baltimore, State of Maryland, by F. C. Miller, an American citizen, and rebuilt by him at Baltimore, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam-vessel's steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied on the inspection of said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances will be the same, in all respects as to strength and safety, as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save that the fact that said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States, and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. On what Calendar of the House is this bill?

The SPEAKER. On the Private Calendar.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in asking unanimous consent are we limited to bills on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I make no objection, Mr. Speaker; I simply wished to understand the rule.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of objecting, but I understand that this case comes under the law, or nearly so, which provides that when a certain amount of repairs equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel so repaired is put upon a foreign vessel that has been wrecked, she may receive an American register, the repairs having been done in this country. The policy of Congress has been, excepting as above, and I hope we will adhere to it, not to grant American registry to foreign-built vessels.

Mr. DUNN. The case lacks this of coming within the law: This vessel was wrecked not on the American coast, but just outside it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I understand and make no objection. I submit the point, Mr. Speaker, simply because we have pending in the Committee on Commerce a bill proposing to grant American registers to a number of steamships of the so-called Corbin enterprise and in the other branch of Congress, and here too bills pending to give American registers to foreign steamships proposed to be purchased by another line, the International Navigation Company, which now leases them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the Senate bill be taken instead of the House bill. They are identical and the House committee has reported both.

The SPEAKER. Is the Senate bill the same as the bill read?

Mr. DUNN. Identically the same.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good opportunity for me to call the attention of this House to these bills just referred to by me proposing to give American registers to foreign-built steamships, the propositions if carried out by legislation, in my opinion, affecting the American ship-building interests very injuriously. Let members think of this.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Senate bill will be considered by the House instead of the House bill.

Mr. DUNN. There is not a word of difference between the two bills.

There was no objection.

The bill (S. 491) was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the House bill will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 4049, and that the same be taken up and put upon its passage.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I supposed, Mr. Speaker, when two bills on the other side of the House had gone through by unanimous consent that this might be allowed to be considered in the same way. It is entirely a local matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. Three bills have gone through on this side, and I think the other side ought to be accorded the privilege of passing at least one bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This is a purely local matter. If the objection is to be insisted upon, and gentlemen on that side are going to be unaccommodating after the courtesy extended on this side by allowing their bills to pass, we shall be forced to make objection hereafter; and in that way the whole House may be incommoded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York does not withdraw his demand for the regular order. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports to be referred to the appropriate Calendar.

CANCELLATION OF PATENTS.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with a recommendation that it lie on the table, a resolution of inquiry as to the right of the United States to sue for cancellation of patents for inventions and discoveries.

Mr. PARKER. I beg to dissent from this report, and ask permission to file a minority report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have this resolution placed on the Calendar?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution, with the accompanying report, will be laid on the table and ordered to be printed; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] will have leave to present the views of the minority of the committee, to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SALE OF CHEROKEE RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. MCRAE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back with amendment the bill (H. R. 138) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas. This is a bill designed to facilitate the settlement of the public lands; and as I understand it is a privileged matter, I ask that it be considered immediately.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done during this call. Privileged reports should not be presented during the call of the committees in the morning hour if present consideration of them is desired.

Mr. MCRAE. Am I correct in supposing that this bill is privileged? If so, I will not make the report now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question, as he has not examined the bill.

Mr. MCRAE. It is a bill which seeks to open public lands to homestead settlers.

The SPEAKER (after examining the bill). The Chair thinks this is not strictly a privileged report under the rule. The bill will be referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. AYRES.

Mr. SHAW, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4956) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James H. Ayres; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask leave to file the views of a minority of the committee on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks leave to present the views of a minority of the committee, to be printed with the report of the majority. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

SAMUEL H. FLEMMING.

Mr. SHAW, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3173) for the relief of Samuel H. Flemming; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORVILLE HORWITZ.

Mr. SHAW, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3469) for the relief of Orville Horwitz, assignee in trust of C. D. De Ford & Co.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. MULLER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4244) to provide for the adjustment of matters connected with certain judicial proceedings in Pennsylvania in which the United States was a party; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

WILLIAM A. AND ADELICIA CHEATHAM.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2322) for the relief of William A. and Adelicia Cheatham for money illegally assessed and paid the Government under protest; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ISAIAH W. LEES AND H. H. ELLIS.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3864) to compensate Isaiah W. Lees and H. H. Ellis, of San Francisco, for services rendered the Government; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EMILE GUERIN AND CHERI P. MAJOR.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6330) to confirm to Emile Guerin and Cheri P. Major title to certain lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

VACATING AN ALLEY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1020) authorizing the District of Columbia to convey the alley, 15 feet wide, running east and west between lots 6 and 7, in square 635, comprising an area of 3,480 square feet of land, to the owner of said lots; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OSHKOSH, WIS.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 57) for the erection of a public building at Oshkosh, Wis.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS FOR MILITIAMEN.

The SPEAKER. The hour now begins at twenty-five minutes to 1 o'clock for the call of committees for the consideration of bills, and the call rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL. Before moving to go into committee for the farther consideration of the bill which in behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I called up yesterday, I move that debate be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. After those thirty minutes have expired will the next committee on the list be called?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] is for the limitation of debate to thirty minutes. The bill must be passed and disposed of before the next committee can be called.

Mr. HAMMOND. My question was not completed. What I meant was, after this bill is disposed of will the next committee on the list be called?

The SPEAKER. Yes; after this is disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL'S motion was agreed to; and the debate was limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DUNN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill the title of which has already been stated. At the expiration of the hour yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee was holding the floor by consent of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have but little to add to what I said yesterday when the hour for the consideration of this class of business had expired. I had already given what I believe was the object of the legislators in limiting the time within which this class of claims could be prosecuted. The law now in force to-day is sought to be repealed. What I wish to say now is, if this bill is to pass, that it ought to fix some limit, even now, within which these claims should be prosecuted. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has an amendment prepared looking to that end, and I think it would be wise to add it to the bill.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, whatever is just to these parties who were injured in the service of the country we all want to do. But in doing that we also want to preserve every barrier which has been erected for the purpose of preventing injustice being done to the tax-payers of the country. I suggest, therefore, we limit the time within which these claims can be prosecuted, say until the 1st of January, 1888. That, it seems to me, would be a wise provision to put on this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. That limit, in my judgment, will hardly be sufficient.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It gives, I think, ample time for the prosecution of these claims.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to its adoption. I have no extra interest in this bill; I am only contending in behalf of these men who were wounded in the service of their country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will give the gentleman the reasons why I do this. This class necessarily stands on a different basis with parties who were regularly enlisted in the service of the United States. There are muster-rolls which are proof of the service which has been rendered. There is a regularly organized force under the Government. When they come to consider a claim and the testimony of his comrades who were there with him, they can look at the record and see whether he was a comrade of theirs or not. These cases therefore depend on a different class of evidence from those where the claimants had been regularly enlisted; and we can not be too careful to guard against fraud in their prosecution. Hence the necessity of limiting the time for their prosecution within probably the lifetime of those who are acquainted with the facts.

I have no desire, of course, to do injustice to any of these parties. I have no feeling in the matter. I can readily see that there may be a certain class of claims of the character indicated. But I can also see the necessity for the adoption of some such limitation as I have stated. I understand the gentleman in charge of the bill is willing to put some reasonable limit on it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio whatever time he desires.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I believe it has been the practice of the Government from its foundation down to grant pensions to those who served in the militia on precisely the same terms and conditions as they have been granted to the regular troops. So long ago as 1806 that provision was made in an act passed then. In 1813 the provisions of the law were even extended to include privateers on the sea.

I will read a few extracts from a speech made by Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, in 1832, in which he said:

> The truth is, whatever was done or expended in that war for particular defense was done or expended for general defense. Troops stationed to guard the mouth of a river, a line of coast, or a line of frontier contributed to the great object as really as those who fought in the field of continental war. There was no such thing as a local operation or hostility on the part of the enemy. He had one single end steadily in view, and he pursued it, without pause or deviation, from the beginning of the struggle to the close. And whether he assailed Massachusetts or Georgia, whether he cannonaded Cape Ann, or burnt the Jersey farm-houses, or poured down his Indian auxiliaries on the back settlements of Virginia, it was all a combined, comprehensive, singly aimed attack upon the independence of the rising States. Whosoever resisted him anywhere contributed to the cause of independence, and may claim the gratitude and justice of those for whom he helped to win it.

That is quite true of the late war. When a pension is granted for disability, wound, or injury received, it does not matter whether it was received on the first day or the last day of the soldier's service. Nor does it matter whether he was called in for the purpose of repelling an attack at a specific point, requiring the service of only a few days or a few hours, or that he served a longer time. The principle is the same. The only question presented is, was he injured or wounded in that service? If so, it has been always held that he was entitled to a pension. But in this case, as in the late war, there were a great many irregular troops, and sometimes irresponsible parties engaged in hostilities, perhaps sometimes not for the purpose of legitimate warfare.

I submit to my friend, therefore, who has charge of this bill if it ought not to be restricted, if it is not now restricted, to such as belonged to some regularly organized troop of which there is record evidence at the War Department.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Ohio to say that the law now regulates that. It provides before the pension can be allowed that the applicant must have been in some regularly organized militia under the command of an officer of the United States; and the regulation of the Pension Office requires that his name shall be borne on the rolls in the Adjutant-General's Office. This bill, as proposed to be passed now, does not change that law or any existing law.

Mr. REAGAN. If I may be allowed, Mr. Chairman, for a moment, I am of the impression that the gentleman from Kansas misreads the present law in making that statement. The statute to which the bill refers relates to three classes, and is in the following words:

> Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State under orders of an officer of the United States—
>
> That is the first class—
> or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States—
>
> That is the second class—
> or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service.

That is the third class. And these provisions do not require the applicant's name to be on any roll as a member of any organized force under any of the laws known to our military service.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It has been the invariable practice, as the history of the Government in the granting of pensions will verify, to limit the granting of pensions for wounds or disability to those serving in some regular troop and not engaged in irregular service as bushwhackers or plunderers.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the rule now. The Pension Office holds that whole clause as applying to those who served under the command of a United States officer; and it is essential that he must have been under the command of some United States officer.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman from Ohio claims, and I agree with him, that the law should require the applicant to have belonged to some regularly organized service and that fact to be exhibited by the rolls.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; some regularly organized militia or regularly organized troop for service under the command of a United States officer.

Mr. MORRILL. The Pension Office already requires that before the pension can be granted.

Mr. McMILLIN. But, as I understand the gentleman from Kansas, the only requirement is that the applicant should have been under the command of an officer of the United States. Now, the gentleman from Ohio, and I repeat I agree with him in that respect, holds that he should not only have been under the command of such officer, but that he should have belonged to some regularly organized body of troops.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Called out by the governor of the State or some other authorized power.

Mr. MORRILL. This I have already stated is required by the existing law. This bill does not change that law.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me call attention to what the bill before us provides, so that we may not be arguing about a mere theory.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not understand that four gentlemen have the right to occupy the floor at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is in possession of the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us see now for a moment what this bill does, so that we will not be discussing perhaps a theory. This bill provides that—

So much of paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes as provides that no claim of a State militiaman on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, is hereby repealed.

That is simply a limitation upon the paragraph that is repealed. And then section 2:

That the claims of all such persons now pending, or which may be hereafter filed, shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service.

Now, if you look at the third section of the law of March, 1864, to which this bill relates, you will see that this lets in the three classes to whom I have already referred, and not only lets them in for wounds, but for other disabilities, which embrace everything.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas in charge of the bill that he should consent to some modification in the direction I have mentioned.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas if this bill in any way changes the law of 1864?

Mr. REAGAN. I think that it changes the second section of that law.

Mr. BURROWS. But aside from that provision, does it make any change in the law?

Mr. REAGAN. It only repeals, as I said, the limitation upon that law. The bill does not seem to have been drawn very carefully, and I think should be modified as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURROWS. It does no more than allow those who have not received pensions under that law to go in and get them? Does it do anything more than that, and are the merits of that law in any way involved?

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point that the time on the other side is consumed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment, which may be considered as pending, which I think will remove any objection to the bill; that is, to add to the second section these words: "but only record evidence shall be considered in adjudicating such claims."

Mr. MORRILL. I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has an amendment prepared having the same object in view.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point that the general debate was limited by order of the House this morning to fifteen minutes on each side, and that the fifteen minutes on that side have expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas yesterday evening had the floor, and had twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MORRILL. By order of the House the debate was limited to thirty minutes, fifteen minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no knowledge of there being an order that the time should be divided between the two sides. The Chair will inquire if that was the order. [After a pause.] The Chair is advised no such order was made. The debate was simply limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] in charge of the bill has remaining a portion of his time. Will this decision of the Chair cut him off?

The CHAIRMAN. He will have ten minutes of his time before the closing of general debate. The gentleman himself asked for the order limiting debate, and that limits him to ten minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. In answer to the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as to the character of claims for pensions under this bill, it seems to me the terms of the bill itself clearly indicate the class of claims it provides for. The language is:

No claim of a State militiaman.

That is to say a militiaman of any State, enlisted under the laws of the State. How can that take in any person who was engaged in irregular service?

Mr. REAGAN. This is simply to repeal the limitation, and you have to look to the third clause of the section of the law which is extended by this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. In addition to that the rules and practice of the Pension Office, it is well understood, would confine the benefits of this law to members of regular organizations.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the pending bill, which extends the benefits of the pension laws to State militiamen wounded or injured in battle. I give to this measure my warmest support, because I believe that it is the duty of the Government to pension every soldier disabled in its service, whether such service was rendered under State laws or directly to the Government under the laws of the United States. It seems that such a view has heretofore obtained the unanimous approval of the membership of this House. I feel warranted in making this declaration because of the fact that a large part of the business on the Pension Calendar has for its purpose the relief of claimants who are or will be beneficiaries under this bill.

This House has for years recognized the justness of these claims for relief, and has, without dissent, placed on the pension-roll those militiamen wounded or disabled in the service of the United States; for it is well understood that though the service was rendered under State law, it was in fact for the benefit and protection of the national cause; and no one has been found to object (and one objection would have been fatal at our evening sessions) to the passage of these just measures. Any private bill proposing to pension any given individual wounded or injured in battle would receive with becoming cordiality the favor of both the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the House. Where, then, is the logic or the reason for declining to say in general terms that which we approve so warmly in a particular case? Let us repeal this restrictive legislation, and give over to the Pension Office a large part of the business now transacted at our evening sessions.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This will save the time of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, it will save time. Sir, I lived in Missouri during the perilous times of the war, and I know that militia organizations were essential to the safety of the people and the protection of property. Armed bands of irresponsible marauders vexed our peace, plundered our people, and destroyed many lives. These militia soldiers took the place of the regular soldiers, who were needed at the front, and thus in truth constituted an invaluable reserve corps for the Union Army. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] has given the reasons which led the committee to a unanimous approval of the pending measure. I can see no tenable ground upon which to rest a dissenting opinion. My voice and vote are for the bill.

The same patriotic motives which induced men to enlist in the regular service actuated these militia soldiers when they defended the Government in the border States. They shared in the privations of the march and the dangers of the field, and no technical barrier should be interposed in the way of a proper care for those wounded and disabled in battle.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROGERS. I have two amendments which I desire to offer to this bill by way of throwing safeguards around it and making it absolutely certain what class of persons the bill is to cover. The first is in these words, and I understand is acceptable to the gentleman who is in control of the bill:

Add to the second section as follows:
"That the time within which such claims shall be prosecuted to a successful issue is hereby limited to the 1st day of January, 1888."

The second amendment is this:

Provided, That no one shall be entitled to the benefit of this act whose name is not borne on a properly authenticated roll in the proper office of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to change a little his first amendment. Instead of limiting the time within which a claim may be prosecuted to a successful issue I suggest to him to make that the limit of the time within which the claim may be filed. Perhaps six months may elapse before the man entitled to a pension hears of this law. He would hardly have time to prove up his claim, considering the necessary delays that occur in the Pension Office. I suggest to the gentleman to make his amendment so as to require the claim to be filed before the 1st of January, 1888. I think that would be more just and equitable.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I incline to yield that point to the gentleman. I do think, though, that in this class of cases there ought to be some limitation fixed. The matter ought not to be left open until every possible hope of establishing the facts to a certainty shall have passed out of existence. The Legislature, in its wisdom, as early as the passage of this law, thought that there ought to be some limitation upon it. My own judgment is that it is perhaps unwise to disturb it at all; but if it is to be disturbed, if it is discovered now that that limitation was made too short, I still think there should be a limitation in pursuance of the principle which governs in all civilized communities, that there ought to be a period fixed when the Government shall no longer be required to take up and consider at great inconvenience, and great additional expense resulting from the increase of force in the Pension Office, matters which have become utterly stale, and which ought not to be considered under the circumstances.

Mr. MORRILL. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with my remarks upon this bill I wish to state my objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS]. I can see no good reason why, if this bill should pass at all, we should place any limitation whatever in it. The placing of a limitation on a bill granting pensions is, to my mind, a concession that the bill itself is wrong. If it is right to pay a pension now, certainly it would be right to pay it under similar circumstances ten years hence.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will permit me I will offer one suggestion in response to his proposition. As a general proposition I admit the force of it, but there is this fact to justify and urge a limitation here which does not exist elsewhere: These were not regular troops, and the evidence in these cases is dependent somewhat upon those who were not regularly in the service of the United States, so that it is of the utmost importance to limit the time for the filing of that evidence to the lifetime of the parties who could properly testify.

Mr. TAULBEE. I reply to the gentleman that, under the second section of this bill, it is provided that claims presented under this law granting pensions to militiamen shall be governed in their adjudication by the rules and regulations prescribed by the Pension Office. In the first place, under our present laws no pension can be granted to a man whose name is not borne on the records of the War Department. If application is made by a man whose name is not on the roll, it is not the prerogative of the Commissioner of Pensions to grant him a pension or to give him a record. That prerogative touching the record is confined to the Adjutant-General of the United States. He, on satisfactory evidence presented to his office, may grant a record to the man asking for a pension. Mr. Chairman, I consider it no misfortune of the Government that the remedies under this bill are difficult and of a somewhat uncertain character. If a man applying for a pension under this law has to rely on oral evidence, then the more time that elapses between the date of his service and the filing of his application the more hazardous and difficult it is for him to prove his claim and get his pension. The lapse of time operates in favor of the Government and against the applicant.

Mr. ROGERS. And there is a corresponding difficulty and a largely increased expense on the part of the Government in detecting frauds.

Mr. TAULBEE. The Government has not the burden of detecting the fraud in such a case. The Government does not assume any responsibility in that particular. The burden of proof rests alone with the claimant, and no man is entitled to a pension under any circumstances where there remains any presumption that his claim is unjust or fraudulent. He must make good his claim. He must establish it by positive proof and must dissipate any presumption that may exist on the part of the Pension Office that it is not a just and valid claim.

Mr. ROGERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further in the brief time allotted me. I have not as yet been able to approach the main issue of this bill. It is urged as an objection that this legislation will grant pensions to men who have had nothing to do with the regularly organized militia of the States. I undertake to say, sir, that that is a strained construction of the bill. The bill does not propose to re-enact paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes. It simply proposes to repeal such part of that section as provides that applications for pension under that act shall be prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

Mr. REAGAN. And leaves the article in full force.

Mr. TAULBEE. It leaves the article in full force, which reads thus:

Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized militia or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered services in any engagement with rebels or Indians.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the law which this bill proposes to perpetuate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to proceed for one or two minutes more. I had not reached the main point of my remarks.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed five minutes longer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But the House has made an order limiting debate.

Several MEMBERS. The time can be extended by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate was limited by order of the House. The remainder of the time for general debate is at the disposal of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL]. The Chair can not see that it is in order to extend the time.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I had thought when this bill with the report was presented to the House that its provisions were so carefully drawn as to obviate every objection to the passage of such a measure, extending mere justice to a class of men who rendered valuable service during the war in the States of Missouri, Kentucky, Minnesota, Kansas, and possibly other States. The objection is made that these claims are growing old and stale; and it is suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that the proof of the claims will not rest with those men belonging to the regular service who, like Cæsar in "crossing the Rubicon," by entering the volunteer Army, "burned their bridges" behind them, but will rest upon the evidence of the militiamen. It is the evidence of these militiamen that the gentleman seems to dread. I think the gentleman is as far from the fact in his estimate of the character of the men who entered the militia from the State of Missouri as he is in his historic illustration with reference to Cæsar "crossing the Rubicon" and "burning his bridges." Cæsar burned no bridges in crossing the Rubicon. The militia of Missouri was composed of true men, not perjurers. The men who composed the militia of the State of Missouri served under the orders of general officers on many fields. Eighty regiments were in the field ready for action in that border State—many from the capture of Camp Jackson, at Saint Louis, until the close of the war. They rendered valuable service at Boonville; they rendered valuable service at Wilson's Creek, under Lyon; they rendered valuable service under that old hero A. J. Smith in pursuing Price and driving him out of the State. They rendered valuable services to their country. There is a record, sir—an honorable record—of every militiaman of that State preserved intact; a record as accessible, as easily reached as the record of any man who served in the Army. They will not now give false evidence, as the gentleman seems to fear, even to secure a pension for a comrade. These men are scattered to-day throughout the length and breadth of the State of Missouri as well as other States of this Union; and I affirm on this floor, without fear of contradiction, that they are among the leading men of the State of Missouri. They embrace men who have occupied the highest positions in the State; and if the only fear of the gentleman is that the allowance of these pensions may be secured by perjured evidence of disreputable militiamen if the limitation is repealed, I say to him there were no such men in the militia from the State of Missouri. One of these men wounded or injured in battle is, in my opinion, entitled to a pension. It should not be denied him. To defeat their just claims I trust this Government will not plead the statute of limitations. It should not make time its paymaster.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I think some of our friends on this side of the House are unnecessarily alarmed about the force and effect of this proposed measure. I suppose a larger number of persons in the State of Missouri will be benefited by this act than in any other State, and I am satisfied from my knowledge of the condition of affairs there that its provisions will not embrace more than three hundred to five hundred men or widows. It applies only to those who were wounded in battle and to the widows of those who were killed.

Now, as to the regularity of that organization there can be no question whatever. The organization was commenced and maintained under the authority of law. It preserved all that was left of law and order and liberty at the time the war closed. It preserved the property, the homes, the families, and the liberties of the soldiers of both armies, North and South. These men were the brothers, the fathers, or the sons of the hundred thousand Federal soldiers who left Missouri to serve in the Union Army. The man who was wounded or killed in battle, though he belonged to the militia organization, has just the same claims on his country as though he had been in the regular Army.

I hope the House will vote down the amendment proposed by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS]. A man should not be held responsible for the fact that delay has taken place in the Pension Office and that his claim was not finally adjudicated within the brief limit of time heretofore fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by order of the House for general debate on this bill has expired.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes as provides that no claim of a State militiaman on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, is hereby repealed.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. When my five minutes expired a short time ago I was proceeding to give my explanation of the effect of this bill in its proposed repeal of the last clause of the third paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes. The provision of law proposed to be repealed by this bill is in these words:

But no claim of a State militiaman or non-enlisted person on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

This bill as it is proposed, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, does not extend the benefits of the pension laws to any persons who were not entitled to them prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, and the limitation prescribed in that law was not that these claims should be filed within that time, but that they should be prosecuted to a successful issue; and no man at all acquainted with the mode of procedure in the Pension Office but will understand that in many instances where the cases were complicated, although the claimants were worthy men, depending on the testimony of comrades to establish material facts, the parties interested were subjected necessarily to almost endless delays. The man who filed his claim the day after the passage of this act, and who by reason of some misfortune over which he had no control could not prosecute his claim to a successful issue before July 4, 1874, was deprived of all benefit under this act. This applies not only to those who failed to prosecute their claims to a successful isssue prior to this date, but to those also who since then have filed claims in the Pension Office or who may hereafter file claims.

Now, the fact that a man has failed to file his claim until a late day is no evidence that it is a fraud. In fact many cases are now found in the Pension Office where the evidence shows and where examination by the board of medical examiners establishes the fact that the disability occurred from wounds or disease which was gradual in development, and in some cases years elapsed after the wound or contraction of the disease which occasioned the disability. Unmistakable cases of disability of quite recent development have been established where the wounds or disease occurred twenty years before. It took all this time for the disability to develop to a pensionable degree, although the claimant may have received his injuries in battle during the late war. Under the present rules and regulations of the Pension Office during all this time such cases were not considered to be entitled to pensions, as the germs of the disease contracted in the service or the wounds received in battle had not yet developed to a pensionable degree. Until this late day, for more than twenty years after the close of the war, the injuries received in the service were not of such a character as to entitle them to a pension. This bill simply extends the benefits of the law to those who were so unfortunate as not to prosecute their claims before this time.

There can be no fears entertained, Mr. Chairman, that this second section of the bill will not do this efficiently and enable the Commissioner of Pensions to keep out all fraudulent claims. Every man who is a lover of the right, every man who eschews fraud, can but congratulate himself and the country upon the very efficient manner in which the Pension Office has prescribed rules and regulations, not only to-day but for a number of years, which have had the effect of precluding persons from procuring pensions through fraudulent means. The system of examining in reference to pension cases throughout the country by special examiners is one of the safeguards. Men of experience in the service who understand the rules and regulations of the Pension Office are sent throughout the country to take evidence of men of good repute in the neighborhood of their residence, so that the very best evidence extant touching the matter in issue is procured and filed with the Department. Where there are such suspicious circumstances surrounding a case filed in the Pension Office upon the face of the evidence accompanying a claim as to lead the Commissioner to doubt in reference to a claim, he immediately orders such examination to be made by his agents.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOLFORD. I will take the floor and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am extremely obliged to my colleague for his courtesy.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kentucky was saying, when the hammer cut him off, that the Government was properly guarded against persons getting pensions who were not entitled to them. Now, is he aware, during the month past, seventeen hundred and fifty-two cases were stricken from the list in Boston alone which had been placed there improperly?

Mr. TAULBEE. No; I was not aware of that. But granting that to be true, and I presume it is, it does not contradict my statement.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And I will suggest to my friend from Kentucky there have been found eighteen claims in the Pension Office within the last two months from his own State where false affidavits were filed by one man, who is now in the penitentiary; Little, I mean.

Mr. TAULBEE. That does not contradict what I have said, if the gentleman understood me correctly. I did not say that the rules of the Pension Office precluded the possibility of all fraud. What I meant to say was, and what I believe I did say was, that the rules and regulations of the Pension Office to-day were sufficient to preclude the imposition of fraudulent claims upon the Pension Office. The very fact that the exceptional cases to which reference has been made were detected is an argument in favor of my proposition. The very fact that out of the vast number of claims presented to the Pension Office there have been only a few, and the very fact that the fraud in those instances has been detected and punished, is the very best proof of the effectiveness of the rules and regulations under which the Pension Office is managed. They are the very best proof that the office is well guarded against the successful prosecution of fraudulent claims.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I must object to the continuation of debate on this bill if the time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has not expired. The gentleman from Kentucky has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to say that this bill would not extend the benefits of the provisions of the pension law to any persons who were not entitled to it prior to the expiration of the right of application under the law proposed to be amended. This bill does not provide that persons not upon the rolls of the Army or of some regularly organized militia force within the borders of a State, serving in support of the Union cause, shall receive pensions or the benefits of its provisions.

There is nothing in paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes which would justify such a conclusion. That section provides—

That members of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered—that is, in the manner not described by the clause immediately preceding it—and who were at the time under the command of a regular officer of the United States Army during an engagement with rebels or Indians, and who shall have received a wound or injury in such temporary service, shall be entitled to the benefits of the bill.

If a man at the beginning of the war saw fit to enlist in some State organization, it is no evidence of his disloyalty to the General Government. Such organizations were frequently commanded by Federal officers in support of the Union cause.

I withdraw the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ROGERS. I shall offer my amendment to the second section.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person except such as were wounded or otherwise disabled in battle in the course of military operations against rebels or Indians.

Mr. MORRILL. Although I regard that as entirely unnecessary I will accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the claims of all such persons now pending or which may be hereafter filed shall be adjudicated in the same manner as claims of persons who have been regularly enlisted in the United States military service.

Mr. ROGERS. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the second section:

"And the time within which such claims shall be filed is hereby limited to the 31st day of December, 1887."

Mr. BURROWS. There is no objection to that. [Cries of "Vote!" Vote!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have an amendment pending which I am willing to withdraw, as this substantially covers the ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, there are some observations I desire to make in response to the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] who has just taken his seat. I supposed he was aware that many cases existed where parties had received wounds in the military service of the United States proper and that there were numerous cases where the Army records did not disclose that fact. If he does not know that to be a fact, let me state that some cases of that character have fallen within my own observation, one of a very recent date. This is an instance where a soldier received an injury perhaps in 1863. At the time it was not regarded as serious, indeed he remained on duty, but it has grown from bad to worse, until several years since he became disabled by virtue of it.

This claim is pending, and the records of the Army disclose no evidence of the fact that he was injured in battle at all. And yet in support of his claim he has the unqualified approval of one officer at least who was present when he received the injury and testifies to the fact, and in my opinion he is as justly entitled to a pension as any man who was in the service. So the granting of these pensions contains two difficulties—one on the part of the claimant himself, to establish the injury where the records of the Government do not establish it; and, on the contrary, where the Pension Office has reason to believe that there is any fraud in the claim as presented, it becomes its duty, and the very object of the organization of the special examining division is to inquire into and obtain testimony on such points to show the fraud. Now, after a considerable lapse of time, after the years that have passed since the war, the question is whether these persons who were in a quasi manner connected with the military service of the Government shall be left to present the claims without limitation. But, as I understand, the committee are willing to accept the amendment, and I shall not consume further time upon it.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to state as a member of the committee and as a friend of the bill that I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the second section the following:

"Provided, That no one shall be entitled to the benefit of this act whose name is not borne on a properly authenticated roll in the proper office of the United States."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If my amendment is pending I withdraw it, as its only object was to keep out irresponsible bushwhackers; and as this accomplishes that object better, I withdraw mine.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know what view gentlemen on the other side take of this amendment. It was contended on yesterday that this was the principal objection to the bill, that irresponsible parties engaged in border warfare disconnected with any legally authorized and established military organization were included in the provisions of the bill. And, Mr. Chairman, they ought not to be included in its provisions. My friend from Kentucky will remember in the history of Southern Kentucky organizations like that commanded by Champ Ferguson, not connected with any military organization either of the confederate or of the Union Army, which in the main consisted of bushwhackers, murderers, sometimes thieves, who engaged in that sort of warfare under cover of the unsettled state of affairs on the border. This class of persons ought not to be recognized in a state of war, and certainly if recognized at all during a period of civilized war they should not be recognized by the Government after the war and put on a footing of equality with men who joined the regular service, who bore the perils of war and received the wounds for which under the law and the Constitution of the country they are entitled to pension at the hands of the Government.

I say, therefore, if these gentleman are in earnest now that this class of persons are not to be benefited by the operation of this law, this amendment should be adopted which excludes them from the provisions of the bill and confines its operations only to those who belonged to regular military organizations in the State, commanded by Federal officers and recognized as such. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to state that the only objection I can urge to that amendment is that it is superfluous; that it is useless. The object it proposes to accomplish is already accomplished by the second section of the bill, which provides for the adjudication of these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 75, noes 38.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I demand tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I withdraw the demand for tellers and make the point there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has made the point that a quorum did not vote, and the Chair directs the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] to take their places as tellers.

Before the count by tellers was completed,

The CHAIRMAN said: The hour under the rule has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DUNN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4915) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 60) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Alton, Ill., and for other purposes.

This is a bill which has passed the Senate. The same bill has been before the Committee on Commerce of this House, has been reported favorably, and is now on the Calendar. I desire to take up the Senate bill for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman refers has bee n by order of the House referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill, and to bring it before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the consideration of the Senate bill the title of which will be read, and to consider the same in the House.

Mr. BEACH. I demand the regular order.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5893, with the Senate amendments thereto, being the urgent deficiency bill, for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH].

Mr. BEACH. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask, for information, if any bill has passed the House this morning by unanimous consent; and, if so, I ask that the title of that bill may be read.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Journal will show that.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to emphasize the fact that a bill has been before the House by unanimous consent this morning and passed the House from the State of New York, and that the gentleman who now objects to the passage of a bill that has already been considered by the House and by the Senate comes from New York.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the question, or rather the group of questions involved in this bill is of the highest importance, because the relation which the various tribes of Indians sustain to the Government of the United States has assumed in the past few years a new phase, and the House and the country are brought face to face with a changed condition of affairs that ought to be well understood by all. In the days when the Government treated with the Indian tribes as separate and distinct peoples or nations, a different rule obtained from that which must now be observed. A new rule and a new order of things must govern Congress and the Executive in dealing with the Indian tribes. I call attention to a section of the Revised Statutes which seems to be but little understood by the country and even by the members of this House. Section 2079 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

No Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty; but no obligation of any treaty lawfully made and ratified with any such Indian nation or tribe prior to March 3, 1871, shall be hereby invalidated or impaired.

It appears then, Mr. Chairman, that since the 3d of March, 1871—fifteen years past—our Government has not recognized, and does not recognize, any Indian tribe or nation as such. This section of the statute brings the Indian into the relation of ward, subjects him to legislative control, and the Government stands in loco parentis, or as the trustee of the estate of the Indian. Now, as a matter of course, the estate of those wards must be managed with reference to two things: First, the interest of the ward; second, the general interest of the people. Let us then approach the discussion of this subject in the light of this statute, and with the understanding that the Indian is simply the ward and the Government the trustee. As a preliminary step to that discussion, I desire to call the attention of the House to a map of the Indian Territory which I have here upon this easel.

This map represents what is known as the Indian Territory. The white disk upon the map [indicating] represents the country occupied by what are known as the five civilized tribes. This red portion of the map near the center of the Territory, constitutes what is known as the Oklahoma country, ceded to the United States by the Creeks and Seminoles by the treaties of 1866. The country between the two lines, which I now indicate, and west of the white disk, constitutes what is known as the Cherokee outlet, or Cherokee strip. The piece of country west of the Cherokee strip, and indicated upon the map, is what is known as the Public Land strip, or Noman's Land, ceded to the United States by the State of Texas in 1850. West of Oklahoma and southwest are the reservations of the Cheyennes, and Arapahoes, the Wichitas, the Kiowas, the Comanches, and the Apaches. These constitute the various subdivisions of the Indian Territory. This Territory contains, including the Public Land strip, 44,154,240 acres of land, an area as great as that of the States of Iowa, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Jersey combined, larger by 266,600 acres than the seven States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Delaware.

Now, as to the character of this country, I call attention to the very able report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, page 9, from which I read:

It is situated between the river and the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude, and nearly in the center of the United States east and west. Its climate is delightful, and its resources almost unbounded. While there are some poor lands within its limits, yet, taken as a whole, it is hardly excelled in its natural resources by any other portion of the United States of the same extent. Its soil is adapted to the raising of all the cereals, and cotton is cultivated with profit in some portions of the Territory, and its grazing resources and adaptability to raising stock are unexcelled. It has an abundance of water, with timber in different portions in limited quantities, while an abundance of coal of good quality is found.

But, notwithstanding this is a beautiful country, its present condition constitutes one of the most phenomenal and, I will add, one of the most disgraceful chapters in the history of our Western civilization.

I wish to call attention to what is said by General Miles in his last annual report to the Lieutenant-General of the Army. He says:

The object in reserving the Indian Territory as a place where the scattered tribes of Indians from Texas, Missouri, Kansas, and other States and Territories could be congregated and removed from before the advancing settlements, was humane and judicious; and it has accomplished its mission. The Indian Territory is now a block in the pathway of civilization. It is preserved to perpetuate a mongrel race far removed from the influence of civilized people—a refuge for the outlaws and indolent of whites, blacks, and Mexicans. The vices introduced by these classes are rapidly destroying the Indians by disease. Without courts of justice or public institutions, without roads, bridges, or railways, it is simply a dark blot in the center of the map of the United States. It costs the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars to peaceably maintain from sixty to eighty thousand Indians there when the Territory is capable of supporting many millions of enlightened people.

Such is the language of General Miles. I presume it will be conceded that no man in the United States is better acquainted with Indian life or the condition of that Territory than he.

In the bill before us for consideration there will be found on page 42 an item appropriating $34,125 for the support of the school at Chilocco—a school situated in the Indian Territory about 1 mile south of the Kansas line. Something was said yesterday with regard to the progress of that school. Before reading the testimony on this subject I wish to say here and now that I approve of the policy of establishing industrial schools, properly located, for the benefit of the Indian tribes. It is a benefit to the white man as well as to the Indian. But the conditions surrounding these schools ought to be well understood before appropriations are made. I read from page 48 of the last annual report of Mr. Oberly, the superintendent of Indian schools. Concerning this school at Chilocco he says:

The location of the school is in many respects unfortunate. It is about 1 mile south of the south line of Kansas, within the Indian Territory—a district of country without law that can be made available for the protection of the school from the incursions of the Indians and the raids of the cowboys. The late superintendent, Dr. H. J. Minthorn, says:

"Cattle-men locate their herds on the school farm, come and go through the fences at pleasure, and defy any one who attempts to interfere. A race-course has been laid out on the school farm, and horse-racing and whisky selling have been added to the list. It is safe to say that more drunken Indians may be seen at this school than at all of the agencies in the Territory; and yet should a murder be committed no arrest could be made without it was done by authorities in the State, miles distant. While the appliances for conducting an industrial school are of the first order, the work is constantly marred and every effort neutralized by the lack of some authority to deal with the disturbing elements constantly met with here. * * * The lawless condition around Chilocco, therefore, continues to scandalize the neighborhood and distress the school."

That is an anomalous condition for an industrial school, and these are strange surroundings. Yet we are called upon to appropriate large sums of money to sustain that institution. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that if an Indian school is to be made a success, something more than the appropriation of money is necessary to insure that end.

Mr. PERKINS. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that criticism very greatly true of every industrial school that may be established upon these reservations?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the same criticism is mainly true with regard to every other industrial school in the Indian country, then I say it is time that Congress should call a halt until different conditions can surround those schools. Why, sir, if it be true that cattle-men illegally and forcibly occupy the farms surrounding the industrial schools, cut down the fences and drive through them at will; if it be true that whisky is sold in the immediate vicinity of these schools and that drunkenness is the rule there, then I pronounce the schools a shame and a blot upon civilization. The gentleman from Kansas concedes too much. He is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and knows more about these things than I do. I presume therefore it may be taken as true that this same condition of affairs exists in all these reservations and surrounds all these schools.

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. FUNSTON. I wish to ask whether the criticism applicable to this particular school applies to industrial schools not in the Territory. Certainly it is not understood that it applies to all industrial schools.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] to ask whether the same criticism would not apply to all these industrial schools.

Mr. PERKINS. On Indian reservations.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly, on Indian reservations; so that the criticism applies whether the schools be located in the Indian Terrritory or elsewhere in the Indian country, if surrounded by the same demoralizing influences of the cattle syndicates.

Mr. FUNSTON. I only desire to have that matter understood.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Something was said yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] with regard to the wonderful progress made by the five civilized tribes. I call the attention of the committee to page 142 of the report of the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1884. I find there the report of the agent at the Union agency, Mr. John Q. Tufts.

It is dated Muskogee, August 29, 1884. He says:

The Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, composing this agency, it is estimated number about 65,000, including white and colored adopted citizens. The number of full-blood Indians is decreasing, while the increased number of mixed-bloods and the adopted white and colored citizens make the population about the same from year to year.

The number of whites is increasing. The cause of this increase is, that the work done in the country is by whites and not by Indians. The mixed-bloods will work some, but the full-bloods hardly ever. Under the laws of the country a citizen is entitled to all the land he may have improved. An arrangement is easily made with a white man who will make a farm for an Indian and give him a portion of the crop for the use of his name, and after a few years give him possession of the farm. Thus it is that more farms mean more white men. The number of whites within this agency who are laborers for Indians, employés of railroad companies, licensed traders, pleasure seekers, travelers, and intruders, must be about 35,000, or half the number of Indians.

This throws a flood of light upon the condition of the five civilized tribes about which so much has been said. It is the official testimony of the agent who resides among them. It shows that the progress of these tribes is not the progress of the Indian, but the progress of the white man. It demonstrates the fact that this progress is not on the part of the Indian but in spite of him, and that the Indian as such is dying out and daily decreasing in numbers. Such is the boasted progress of the five civilized tribes.

These tribes are within the jurisdiction of the United States court for the western district of Arkansas. An article published in the Saint Louis Globe-Democrat of March 5 shows the alarming prevalence of crimes in that district, most of which were committed in the Indian Territory. This article says:

There are twenty-two convicts awaiting transportation to Detroit, all convicted since the first Monday in February. The marshal always holds them here until he gets a car-load, then charters a car and takes them straight through to their destination. This crowd will probably be taken off this week in order to make room in the jail for fresh arrivals, there now being one hundred and ten behind the bars, about as many as can be accommodated. Besides these a large number have been convicted who received short jail sentences.

The eight condemned murderers, under sentence to be hanged on the 23d of April, appear to be the jolliest of all, and, with one exception, none of them are making the least preparation to meet their fate.

In an account of a recent execution at Fort Smith I saw it stated that between sixty and seventy persons had been executed on the same gallows. This is a human sacrifice made and a blood offering poured out to this monstrous condition of affairs in the Indian country. Can this Congress, responsible to the American people, afford to sit idly by and allow such a horrible condition of affairs to be longer continued?

I will now call attention to another shameful state of affairs in the Indian Territory. I read from page 129 of the same report. The agent at the Ponca, Pawnee, and Otoe agency, in his report, August 15, 1884, says:

The most deplorable of all these barbarous customs is the selling of girls in marriage; this practice, I think, is universal. A marriageable girl in a family is considered as much an article of merchandise as a horse or an ox, and is sold to the highest bidder and assumes the married state and the duties of maternity when she is a mere child, and often sorely against her will. An unmarried girl of more than fourteen or fifteen years of age is not to be found. The elevating and refining influence exerted by young ladies in white society is unknown among the Indians. The effect is bad in every way. It cuts short their education at the very point where it would begin to be of some practical advantage. A girl over fourteen or fifteen years of age is seldom found in the schools. It breaks them down physically and they become prematurely old; it degrades the women to a condition little better than slavery.

Such, in brief, is the condition of this Indian Territory, and it constitutes in my judgment one of the foulest blots upon the civilization of this country. It calls for heroic treatment and speedy remedy, only to be found in prompt legislation by Congress. It can not be remedied in any other way. The Indians should be brought into such relations with the Government of the United States as to be amenable to law; then these practices can be prohibited and the law prohibiting them enforced.

I come now to a different branch of the question, the unoccupied portion of this Territory—that portion which has been unoccupied for almost a quarter of a century—certainly for over twenty years; namely, the country ceded by the Creeks and Seminoles by the treaty of 1866, commonly called Oklahoma, and the Cherokee strip, also ceded to the United States by the treaty of 1866. When I use the word "unoccupied" I do not mean to say there are not trespassers there, but the word "unoccupied" I use in its legal acceptation, and mean it is not occupied by any person having the right to be in that Territory. There are no Indians within the territory known as Oklahoma, nor on the Cherokee strip, nor on the Public Land strip lying west—they are all unoccupied. The Cherokee strip contains 6,022,255 acres of unoccupied land; the Public Land strip contains 3,672,640 acres; the land ceded by the Creeks and Seminoles contains 1,887,800 acres, making a grand total of unoccupied country of 11,583,295 acres—larger than the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Jersey combined; nearly twice as large as New Hampshire; almost 100,000 acres larger than the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Connecticut.

Then we have the country occupied by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who are located by executive order. They have no patents to the lands, nor are they occcupying them by virtue of treaty stipulations. Farther south are the Wichita, Kiowa, and Comanche reservations. The Cheyennes and Arapahoes occupy 4,297,771 acres; the Wichitas, 743,610 acres; the Kiowas and Comanches, 2,968,893 acres; and that also includes the territory occupied by the Apaches, making a grand total occupied by these insignificant tribes of 8,010,274 acres. The population of these reservations is given at 7,500. But this includes a large percentage of whites, half-breeds, and Mexicans and negroes, which would probably reduce the actual Indian population to near or perhaps less than 5,000.

But admitting, Mr. Chairman, that 7,500 is the true census of this part of the territory occupied by the tribes I have named, which is largely in excess of the number which would be found by an exact count, there is sufficient land in these reservations west of Oklahoma, and south of the Cherokee strip, to give to each person 1,100 acres, or more than 4,400 acres to each family of four persons.

Now, if we should give these Indians their land in severalty, at the rate of 160 acres per capita, or 640 acres to each family of four persons, and settle them in the region where they now are they would only require 1,200,840 acres, leaving a surplus of 6,809,794 acres which can be opened to settlement and civilization.

The Osage, the Kansas, the Nez Percé, the Ponca, the Otoe, the Pawnee, the Iowa, the Sac and Fox, the Kickapoo, and Pottawatomie reservations, lying east of Oklahoma and west of the civilized tribes, contain an area of 3,665,365 acres of land with an Indian and mixed population of 5,200 persons. Now, if all these Indians west of Oklahoma and south of the Cherokee strip should be removed on to these small reservations, the combined population would still have 287 acres to each, or 1,148 acres to each family of four, which would be more than ample for all of their purposes. This would leave in the Indian Territory, including the Public Land strip, over 20,000,000 acres of unoccupied land, all available for settlement—an area nearly as large as the State of Indiana. Would this be unjust to the Indians west of the five civilized tribes? With 1,148 acres to each family of four persons, who can reasonably claim that any injustice is being done? If there is any injustice in this policy it would be against the home-seeker, who can only take 160 acres for himself and family.

Now I submit that an Indian has no use for a large area of country after the game upon which he subsisted has been destroyed. What use have these Indians for more than 1,148 acres to a family of four? There is no game on the reservations they now occupy. There is no game in Oklahoma, nor is there any in the Cherokee strip, for reasons which I shall show you later. What rule of justice or of fair dealing requires that a savage who does not occupy the soil for cultivation, who has no more use for it after the game has been destroyed than a wolf, and who is supported by the Government, should be allowed to remain there and roam over millions of acres of land, which he refuses to cultivate, to the exclusion of white settlers who want homes and would cultivate the soil if they had the opportunity? The relation of the Indian is entirely different from what it ever was before in the history of this country, and is it possible that Congress will be dumb to the appeals or deaf to the cries of our landless people who are pleading for homes?

But the question is asked, Do you propose to take the lands from them without their consent? No, sir. Do you propose to take them without paying for them? No, sir, never. Be just to the Indian, be humane to him, but at the same time be humane and just to our own constituents. That is my rule. I know of no better rule than that. I ask nothing else. But I say that fair dealing to the white man and that fair dealing and mercy to the Indians require that this Government shall immediately take steps to open up all of these abandoned and needless reservations to white settlement, to schools, to churches, and to all the benefits of a Christian civilization.

But the suggestion will be made at once that there are certain railroad corporations that have grants which are now in abeyance in this Indian country. In the first place, I deny that there are such grants in the Indian Territory; but out of abundant caution, if there should be any such grants, then I say repeal those acts and forfeit all those grants; for the country should be reserved to homestead settlers and no other class of persons.

If this policy is pursued it is not too much to say that within eighteen months after this vacant country is opened to settlement there will be a million of people there, and they will be knocking for admission into the Union as a State with all the advantages of sisterhood and all the advantages of our American civilization.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What is the use of their knocking when others all ready now for admission can not get in.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. "Knock, and it shall be opened." It does not say "when you first knock it shall be opened." [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Keep knocking.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to the question of the intention of the Government as to the further settlement of Indians in this Territory. I call the attention of the committee to page 10 of the last annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It is claimed by some would-be philanthropists—good people, but misguided, because they do not understand all the facts connected with the situation in the Indian Territory—that it should be the policy of the Government to settle friendly Indians there. They are unmindful of the fact that Congress on two occasions has expressly forbidden the further removal of Indians to the Indian Territory.

By the act of March 3, 1877, the officers of the Government were prohibited from removing the Sioux Indians or any portion of them into the Indian Territory, and by a subsequent act the removal of the Apaches into that Territory was also forbidden. But the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on page 10 of his last annual report, after having discussed this question, says:

But a stronger and more potent objection to concentration in the Indian Territory exists than any yet given, and that is the fierce and uncompromising opposition which this proposition meets in the almost unanimous sentiment of the white citizens of the four great States of Missouri, Kansas, Texas, and Arkansas which surround this Territory. Such an array of political power and influence, speaking as one man, is entitled to respect and grave consideration. In a country like ours, where public opinion crystallizes into law, where it makes Presidents, and Congresses, and courts, and commands armies, it can not safely be disregarded. And although the representatives of the other States of the Union might believe that the concentration of the savage Indian tribes of this country in the Indian Territory would be best for the Indians and greatly relieve the Treasury of the United States, as it would, nevertheless I would not advise such a step, even if it should be agreeable to the Indians now scattered over a vast area of country, against the earnest protestations of the people of the four great States referred to.

So that the Government has abandoned all idea of the settlement of any more Indians in the Indian Territory. Now, this being settled is not the duty of Congress plain and unmistakable? If we are not to settle any more Indians there shall the homeless white people be forever excluded from its domain? But it is claimed we have no right to settle white people on Oklahoma or the Cherokee strip, and to that proposition I invite the respectful attention of the committee. The Secretary of the Interior, on page 32, in his last annual report, speaking of Oklahoma, says:

By the third article of the treaty of August 16, 1866 (14 Stat., 766), it is stipulated that "in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Seminoles cede to the United States their entire domain," consisting of 2,169,080 acres, at the rate of 15 cents per acre.

By the third article of the treaty of August 11, 1866 (Ibid., 786), the Creeks, for the same purpose, ceded to the United States the west half of their entire domain, which cession passed 3,402,430 acres, at the rate of 30 cents per acre. The two cessions combined aggregated 5,571,410 acres. The Indians have been paid therefor according to agreement.

They have received the money and the transaction is closed. The country lies unoccupied and has been for more than twenty years. The Cherokee strip was ceded to the United States by the Cherokees also in 1866, for the purpose of settling friendly Indians thereon, and can not now be legally occupied, either by the Cherokees or by their authority, or by white people. I call the attention of the committee to the opinion of Attorney-General Devens, which will be found in 16 Attorney-Generals' Opinions, page 470.

One J. W. Bell, a Cherokee, had, by authority, as he claimed, of the Cherokee Nation, settled upon the Cherokee strip. He was removed by the military. The question was brought to the attention of the Attorney-General by the Secretary of the Interior as to whether Bell had a right, being a Cherokee, to occupy any portion of the Cherokee strip west of 96° after it had been ceded by the treaty of 1866, and, if not, whether the military had the right to remove him. The Attorney-General, after quoting the terms of the treaty, sums up the whole matter in the following language:

The fair interpretation of this article would seem to be that the lands to which it refers were absolutely reserved to the United States, upon the conditions therein named, for the settlement thereon of tribes of friendly Indians. The jurisdiction and possession of the Cherokee Nation, as to the lands from time to time remaining unsold and unoccupied, would give no right to the nation to settle its citizens thereon until the privilege acquired by the United States to settle tribes of friendly Indians in any part of the Territory west of 96° should be satisfied, or, in some authentic way, be renounced. And this being so, no person attempting a settlement on these lands can justify under any authority given by the Cherokee Nation.

On the contrary, it is the duty, as it is the interest, of the nation to prevent its citizens from making such settlement. It appears that Bell produced no evidence that such authority had been given him, but if he had, and the view above taken be correct, the United States, in the maintenance of their treaty privilege, would have been justified in ejecting him.

Now, here is an instance where a Cherokee, a member of the Cherokee tribe, had undertaken to settle on the Cherokee strip after the cession of 1866, and the military force of the United States ejected him, and the Attorney-General decided that that ejectment was rightful, and that his occupancy was contrary to the true meaning and intent of the sixteenth article of the treaty.

And it is equally clear that the Cherokee strip can not be legally occupied by white people as lessees of the Cherokee tribe. This was officially decided by Attorney-General Garland on the 15th of July last in an opinion rendered at the request of the present Secretary of the Interior. This opinion relates directly to the leases of the cattle syndicates now occupying the Cherokee strip, as well as to all Indian leases within the United States. He says:

But the present inquiry in substance is (1) whether the Department of the Interior can authorize these Indians to make leases of their lands for grazing purposes, or whether the approval of such leases by the President or the Secretary of the Interior would make them lawful and valid; (2) whether the President or the Department of the Interior has authority to lease for such purposes any part of an Indian reservation.

I submit that the power of the Department to authorize such leases to be made, or that of the President or the Secretary to approve or to make the same, if it exists at all, must rest upon some law, and therefore be derived from either a treaty or statutory provision. I am not aware of any treaty provision, applicable to the particular reservations in question, that confers such powers. The Revised Statutes contain provisions regulating contracts or agreements with Indians, and prescribing how they shall be executed and approved (see section 2103); but those provisions do not include contracts of the character described in section 2116, hereinbefore mentioned.

No general power appears to be conferred by statute upon either the President or Secretary or any other officer of the Government to make, authorize, or approve leases of lands held by Indian tribes; and the absence of such power was doubtless one of the main considerations which led to the adoption of the act of February 19, 1875, chap. 90, "to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases." The act just cited is moreover significant as showing that, in the view of Congress, Indian tribes can not lease their reservations without the authority of some law of the United States.

In my opinion, therefore, each of the questions proposed in your letter should be answered in the negative, and I so answer them.

I now wish to point out to this House one of the most disgraceful chapters in the history of this whole controversy over the Indian Territory. I have here a map which exhibits the present condition of the Cherokee strip. Gentlemen will see that it is of variegated colors, having many subdivisions, irregularly shaped, marked out upon it, and that those subdivisions cover every foot of the entire area of this strip, embracing more than 6,000,000 acres.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not a map prepared by the Government of the United States or by any of its officers; it is a map prepared by a cattle syndicate, the "Cherokee Strip Live Stock Association"—a map made for them and defining the boundaries occupied by the different lessees under the syndicate. The map bears this inscription:

This map was compiled from surveys of ranges made for the association in 1883 by S. T. Wood, Fred. Eckert, T. W. Walton, and C. H. Burgess, and is believed to contain the best information accessible for the location of ranches, camps, range-lines, &c.

The syndicate that had this map prepared procured from the Cherokee tribe a lease of this entire Cherokee strip, numbering over 6,000,000 acres. They agreed to pay, and are now paying, to the Cherokee tribe $100,000—less than 2 cents per acre—for the privilege of occupying that country with their herds. But they have subleased it to as many sub-lessees as are indicated by the spots on this map—one hundred in number. They pay to the Cherokees $100,000, and they sublease it for about $500,000 per annum to the different cattle companies now occupying that country—a net profit of $400,000 yearly to this syndicate which holds possession of the strip to the exclusion of white settlers, and in plain violation of section 2116 of the Revised Statutes and of the opinions of the Attorney-General before quoted.

The names and brands of the sublessees are given upon this map and some of them are very significant. In the southwest corner of the strip you will notice a large area of country embracing perhaps from 300,000 to 500,000 acres, including a stream with all its tributaries. This is the lease of "the Dominion Cattle Company, of Canada," as you will observe. Here [pointing] is the New York Cattle Company, and there the Eagle Chief Pool, the Wyeth Cattle Company, and the McClellan Company. In the northeast corner you will find indicated two leases of the Standard Oil Company. Their brand is "O. I. L." They "struck oil" down there. [Laughter.]

These lessees are all pooled and it only costs about 28 cents to raise a steer until he is three years old. How can an honest farmer compete with that kind of thing?

Now, I submit that the question is no longer whether the red man or the white man shall occupy this Cherokee strip. The white man already occupies it. He has been placed there by the Indian himself in violation of law. The real battle is whether the poor man seeking a home, who has but a single yoke of oxen perhaps to draw his family to the Territory, shall have a right to go there taking with him his family, the church, and the school-house, or whether he shall be excluded by the rich foreign and domestic cattle syndicates that are there in violation of law. [Applause.]

That is the question before this country and before this House; and I want to leave this committee and this House without further excuse in dealing with this Indian question. If this monstrous condition of affairs is to continue longer it shall be with the full blaze of the facts streaming upon this House and upon the poople.

Mr. DUNHAM. Why does not your administration enforce the law?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Well, I am sorry to say, I have no administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Why does not the administration enforce the law?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman from Massachusetts puts the question in a different shape, "Why does not the administration enforce the law?" I intend to answer that question, and I will answer it fearlessly. I retort upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] and ask him the question, why was it that your administration allowed these cattle syndicates to settle upon that country and infest every acre of the public domain? This was done when Chester A. Arthur was President of the United States.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is not answering the question.

A MEMBER. It is a Yankee way of answering.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is a Yankee way of answering, and a very good way; but I will answer directly.

This unlawful occupancy by the cattle syndicate was effected under a Republican administration. Under the administration of Mr. Arthur the poor people tried to go into Oklahoma and were driven out by the military. Mr. Cleveland, on coming into power, found this unlawful condition of affairs in the Indian Territory, and he has not changed the policy of Mr. Arthur except as to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation and the Oklahoma country, where he did order the military to eject the cattle syndicate. It was not obeyed as to Oklahoma except by the merest pretense.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not you claim on the stump last year, and did not all the Democratic speakers in the State of Iowa claim that President Cleveland had removed all these intruders from that Territory?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question; for it affords me an opportunity to apologize to my constituency and to the whole country for having made a statement believed at the time to be correct, but which I now ascertain was not correct. I believed when I was canvassing my State during that campaign that we had entered upon a new era, and that the administration had issued an order which, if not in legal terms, did in effect apply to every cattle syndicate and every herder within the Indian Territory, and that this order was being honestly enforced. But I learn with regret that such is not the case; and I cheerfully state it here, for there is no administration on this earth in whose interest I would conceal the plain truth with regard to this matter.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not just now. Mr. Chairman, what excuse can there be? In justice to the present administration, and especially to the very able and conscientious Secretary of the Interior, I wish to say that the occupancy of this territory by cattle syndicates is not pleasant to him, is contrary to his convictions of right, and that he intends as soon as possible, as he has openly signified to the country, to see to it that the syndicates shall be expelled from the whole territory.

But I want to know what excuse there can be for using the military to keep the poor people from entering the territory on the Cherokee strip, when at the same time the rich cattle companies are permitted to occupy it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will be permitted to go on and finish his remarks.

Mr. RYAN. If the Chair will recognize me, I will take the floor at this time and yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Iowa in which to conclude his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. RYAN. Very well, then; I will yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has agreed to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN]. Is he willing to consent to that agreement?

Mr. ALLEN. How much more time does the gentleman from Iowa want?

Mr. LONG. It is the understanding then that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN] shall have his one hour if he needs it?

Mr. RYAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I will take the floor when the hour of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. RYAN. Before yielding to the gentleman from Iowa, I have a remark or two to make.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to remind the gentleman that at the last session of Congress this whole question was thoroughly discussed. At the conclusion of that discussion I offered an amendment to the appropriation bill, which authorizes the President of the United States to negotiate with the Creeks, the Seminoles, and the Cherokees, with a view to opening the Cherokee outlet and what is known as Oklahoma, to settlement. I wish to ask him what, if any, action has been taken by the Executive under that law, and whether he does not regard its provision as mandatory? And when he answers that question I desire to ask him another.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am familiar with the law passed by the Forty-eighth Congress, and I regard its provision as mandatory. I do not believe it left any discretion either in the Executive or the Department. I have examined also the reasons given by the Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report for not appointing that commission.

In substance they are as follows: That there had been an organization known as the Oklahoma boomers, which had invaded the Indian Territory for the purpose of settling there; that they had been excluded by the order of the President of the United States and ejected by the military, and in consequence of that attempted entry upon the Indian Territory by these boomers, as they are familiarly called, or settlers, he did not think it wise to appoint the commission. In my judgment the excuse is not sufficient, and the commission should have been appointed in accordance with the provision of that law.

Mr. Chairman, the necessities of the people are very great. There are thousands of families all over the land without homes, thousands of men who belong to the labor organizations of the country now out of employment, and I think any legislation on the part of Congress looking to the opening of these unoccupied lands to these homeless people ought to be met and responded to in the amplest and most generous manner.

Mr. RYAN. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I wish to ask him whether the executive order for the removal of cattle from the Indian Territory did not apply to the lessees in the entire Indian Territory, and whether subsequently some Democratic Senators did not appeal to the President personally to restrict its operation simply to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will say in response to that question that the executive order applied to the entire Indian Territory. It was so interpreted, as I understand, but whether any different view was taken in consequence of Democratic Senators having visited the President or not, I do not know, and express no opinion. It seems to me, however, the gentleman's question is a little narrow and rather partisan in its character. If I understand the interests at stake in the Indian Territory, there are certain Republican Senators interested as well as Democratic Senators, and some of them do not live very far from the district which the gentleman represents.

Mr. RYAN. But that does not answer my question. I ask you if from personal information you do not know that the order was not executed because of the influence of Senators brought to bear on the present Executive?

Several MEMBERS. What Senators?

Mr. RYAN. Democratic Senators.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will say in all candor I know not whether any influence was used on the part of any Senator.

But I do know this, that I came to this city immediately after the inauguration of the President and laid the whole matter before his excellency, using this very map which is now before me. I also laid the same map and the same facts before the Department of the Interior; and I do know that at that time, as soon as it was telegraphed West that Hon. Sidney Clarke of Kansas and myself were here asking for justice for the settlers and opposing these rings and syndicates, this city swarmed with the paid attorneys and representatives of the cattlemen as it swarms now, and I met Senators who I believe to be interested in the cattle syndicates, and who stepped into the Department as I was retiring, and they spoke to me, introducing the subject in an offensive manner—at least one of them did so.

Now, sir, I have been struggling to bring this matter before the country and before the Department for a long time. My appeal is in behalf of the people, for I believe they have been mistreated and trodden down by the cattle-men, the syndicates, and the rich corporations; that they have robbed the people by taking possession of this property.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Is it a fact that the Senators and the paid attorneys that came here in the interest of these cattle syndicates beat you and the representative men who accompanied you before this administration?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir; I did not say that. There has been a battle of a year and the battle is not yet ended——

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to make a statement in answer to that question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. The condition of these leases, or the title to the lands behind them, is different; and therefore the rule that has excluded them from the Arapaho and Cheyenne reservations did not apply to the Cherokee strip——

Mr. BRUMM. Does not the law apply to all of them?

Mr. LONG (addressing Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa). Do you admit that to be a correct interpretation of the situation?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will answer that in a moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. If gentlemen will wait until I have finished my statement they will see the obvious bearing of it and admit its accuracy.

The facts are that no complaints came from the Indian tribes there. In this case, however, the Indian tribes complained to the Department of the cattle companies; and upon their complaint to the Secretary of the Interior the cattle companies were excluded from those places. But with reference to the Cherokee strips, the Indians themselves made the leases and desired them to be continued, and protested against setting them aside.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now I wish to answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. I claim that before the law there is no difference. There is no difference whatever between the Cherokee strip and the Cheyenne and Arapaho country, no difference whatever in law. The decision of the Attorney-General applies to all alike. But Oklahoma proper is not Indian land. If the Government ejects one class of men from any portion of the Indian Territory I claim that it should exercise its power against the rich corporations which have taken possession of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois goes into a state of innocuous desuetude. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now a word as to the proper remedy for this bad state of affairs. There is no advantage to be gained here either by the Republican or the Democratic party. The course of both administrations has been the same, except as before mentioned.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did you not in the spring, when you were here a year ago, receive pledges from the administration that the cattle syndicate should be removed, and did you not report that to the people of the West?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understood the administration to say in the most emphatic terms that no unlawful occupancy should be permitted in that Territory on the part of any one, be it cattle syndicate or citizens.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman mention the Senators' names, without reference to parties?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That would not be in place here. There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Territories which I had the honor to introduce, to organize into a Territorial goverment all the unoccupied portion of the Indian Territory, including the Public Land strip, looking to the speedy opening of it to homestead settlement. That bill also provides for a commission to negotiate with the Indians on the Cheyenne and Arapaho and adjacent reservations; to negotiate with them with a view to their settlement on the small reservations mentioned in the early part of my speech, and with the view of openidg to settlement the reservations which they may relinquish.

Mr. RYAN. Whom does it authorize to negotiate?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. A commission of five persons, to be appointed by the President, who shall have full power to negotiate with these Indians for their removal and for the admission of that part of the country into Territorial government.

Mr. RYAN. If the bill should become a law what reason has the gentleman to believe that it will be respected and executed by the administration?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am sure the administration will respect and obey the law.

Mr. RYAN. Has it done so hitherto?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I admit the law authorizing the appointment of the commission passed by the last Congress has not yet been complied with.

Mr. RYAN. Then you think it is a question of time?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I had hoped there would be nothing partisan dragged into this debate. I wish to be perfectly fair and frank toward both administrations and to state the facts and only the facts. It will not do for the gentleman from Kansas to assume that this administration would disobey a plain act of Congress organizing this territory and providing for a commission to negotiate with the Indians.

Mr. RYAN. You have just told us it did.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And I am sorry the gentleman undertakes to drag anything of that kind into this discussion. It does not belong to it.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman has just declared that the Executive did disregard a public law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have said in my opinion the law was mandatory. I do not know what opinion the Executive may have as to the mandatory character of that statute. I have said in my opinion it was mandatory and ought to have been speedily and promptly obeyed.

Mr. RYAN. It is your judgment it was mandatory?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is my opinion. I do not know what the judgment of the Interior Department or the Executive may have been. But I say here and now that in compliance with the demand of public opinion as a matter of simple justice to the poor people needing homes this bill to organize a Territorial government over that portion of the Indian Territory west of the civilized tribes ought to become a law without any delay.

Then steps should further be taken by the Executive and the Department to open up also by negotiation all that part of the country occupied by these blanket Indians in the southwest portion of the Territory. What use have these Indians, now that the game has gone, for any more country than they will have when they remove on these small reservations? They will then have by actual computation, including the Indians now there, 1,144 acres to each family of four persons. We only ask of the Government that this country shall be opened so that a white family of four or more may have 160 acres. I would like to know what rule of Christianity or of philanthropy or of fair dealing between man and man, between the white man and the red man, can require that the Indian who will not cultivate the soil shall have thousands of acres to roam over at his will and which he refuses to cultivate?

The whole question is under the blaze of public opinion. It is to-day one of the most important questions before the public, and this House must meet it. The committee of the House can not ignore it. It can not be ignored without being followed by retributive justice at the ballot-box against any party or any man who steps in here to block the wheels of progress in the interest of these cattle syndicates which are trampling the poor people of the country in the dust and overriding law, administration, and Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. RYAN. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. In the time I may use in discussing this question I do not propose to go over the whole Indian policy, nor do I suppose that I can recommend to this House any novel or dramatic features with regard to it. But I can not sit here as a member of the committee having the matter in charge, and as a representative of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which has ever stood with willing hand and open purse in aid of every philanthropic movement which tended to the elevation of the human race, without putting myself on record on this great question.

The discussion as it has already gone on has developed a wide range and has brought to the attention of this House one of the living issues of this century; a question which has been continually placed in the back-ground, which has been put to one side, which has been bridged over, until a time has come when it will no longer down at our bidding, but sits at our feast an unwelcome guest.

The march of progress and civilization in this country during the last fifty years has been something remarkable. It has brought to our boundless domain a band of thrifty and intelligent settlers who have established our boundaries, scattered over our broad domain, and who by the very logic of circumstances have now completely surrounded the Indian in his reservation and brought the question of his future to our attention in so direct a manner that it can be no longer shirked or avoided. To-day the march of progress halts at the boundaries of the reservation. The mighty arm of the law has been called in force and has arrested this progress on the boundary line, but the elements of this progress, this seething, active, restless mass of activity, is even now surging and beating against the barrier and can not be much longer delayed or impeded. By delay, by compromise, by a do-nothing policy we may possibly keep it at bay for a while only. This progress is with us; it is a part of us, and we can no more stop its resistless force than we can stop Niagara. It is ordained by Divine wisdom. It is with us and it will remain with us, filling the waste places and causing the wilderness to bloom with the beauty of civilization. And the most we can hope to do is to guide and direct it in the paths of greatest usefulness. It is upon this theory that all our legislation on this question of an Indian policy, if it is wise, will be determined.

We must recognize the fact that the Indian is with us, and is to remain with us; and it is for us, if we wish to accomplish any good work, to recognize this fact by keeping abreast of the times. We shall have to waive under protest, I admit, certain treaty stipulations with the Indian, which guaranteed him certain rights but which the march of events has made it impossible for us to execute, giving him the rights as soon as he is able to obtain them, and dividing with him and with people by whom he is surrounded certain portions of the land. Why, gentlemen, when to the Pilgrims in the Plymouth colony, long years ago, in their first winter, in their desolate and disheartened condition, the friendly Indian came saying, "Welcome, Englishman," he welcomed to the continent all the qualities of energy and thrift and perseverance which characterized the English-speaking race. He was our friend in those earlier struggles, and to-day we do not look to see him go down before the advance of a stronger and brighter civilization, but to see him merge into it and come up through it and by means of it into the best estate he ever knew.

I listened yesterday with great interest to the able presentation of this case which was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and I was delighted to find him, out of his vast fund of information and experience, coming into the same position to which I suppose the legislation of this session is to be directed. For if I understood him correctly, although opposing this bill, he outlined a policy toward the Indian which in many respects is quite up to the advanced idea of the most advanced so-called humanitarian; a policy which looks to the affiliation of white men and Indians by opening up large tracts of reservation lands to actual settlers, and by bringing the civilization of the farmer and agriculturist to the study and imitation of the Indian.

There has, we are told, already been passed by another branch of the law-making power a bill which puts in form almost the sentiments which he uttered here, a bill known as the Sioux or Dawes bill. I believe with him that we can not do these Indians a greater injury or a greater wrong than to pauperize them. We know something of the effect of the "free-soup" charity in our large cities, and we must not practice it on a greater scale among these people. What we need to-day very largely is to break up these reservations and to bring the Indians in contact with the white men, that they may learn and know the white man's ways. The very qualities which the Indian needs to acquire are found to-day, I believe, in the white inhabitants of our Western Territories. I am not willing to admit, as some have said, that the drift of those who are not regarded as in the very best possible estate in some other community has been to settle in the Western Territories, for I believe that in those Territories to-day there are to be found men and women as thrifty, as intelligent, and as good citizens as we are likely to find in many of our more thickly settled communities at the East, men and women whose daily labor is their wealth, and whose labor is also the wealth of the nation; whose habits of industry and thrift are needed every day for their own support, but which ultimately brings competence to thousands and honor to the nation.

These are the people whom we ought to bring in contact with the Indian. Let such people have land beside him and let him acquire their methods and habits. I do not believe that the time has yet come when we should take from the Indian his annuities—those we can not take—and I do not believe the time has come when we should take from him all the funds that are provided for his subsistence. We must feed him for the present, but the aid should be gradually taken away, and the Indians should be made to learn, as many of us have had to learn from bitter experience, that the only way he can come into his best estate is by work. Let the Indian learn by suffering. Let him bear trouble. Yes, let him fall, and let him fall again, provided we stand by to help him and to see that he shall not utterly despair.

I believe it is the Divine purpose to bring him up as every individual and every nation is brought up into its highest estate and greatest benefit through some trial. The Indian can be no exception to the general rule. I am satisfied that the policy of tending the Indian on a pillow and feeding him with a spoon will no longer serve; but only by putting him on his feet and making him walk will he ever be able to stand up a man in the image of his Maker. We should sell a portion of his lands and secure the balance to him so that he may not dispose of it, even by lease, for the period of at least a generation. Then, with the money which is received from the proceeds of his land sales, we can supply him with school-houses and means of education. And by "means of education" I do not mean a high-school or a classical education; but I mean that we shall supply him with farm implements and with a certain amount of instruction how to use them, and the kind of every-day common-school education which will enable him to meet and understand the ways of men. This policy, which has been adopted on some reservations, I would make general.

I have in my mind now the reservation of the Omahas in Nebraska, where the Indians have been urged and induced to take their lands by allotment in severalty. The inclination of those Indians has invariably been to take the bad lands; but by intelligent work they have been brought to a better understanding of their interests and have been made to take and secure the very best lands in their reservation.

And those people to-day are the equal in shrewdness and brightness to the white man in making their trades. They raise their crops, they carry them in some cases to some distant town or wherever they can realize the largest prices, and although they are poor, yet they are advancing and improving.

Now, the question has been raised whether these schools for which appropriation is made in this bill are of any benefit? I should say, by all means they ought not to be abolished. If any change is to be made let the schools at Carlisle and Hampton and Lawrence be used as training schools for the education of native teachers, who shall be placed in the reservation schools as they are established and be the means of doing a good work among their own people.

I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] who spoke yesterday in regard to the advance in civilization which these several tribes have made. I say that this advance in the last twenty years—yes, in the last ten years—has been remarkable, and the heroic sacrifices made by noble women, the benevolent efforts of institutions organized for that purpose, and the waking up of the American people, are the agencies which have brought about this result. And the work has but just commenced. Patience, and its results will presently appear.

Here is a question upon which we can all unite. There are no bickerings as to party management in the discussion of this question. Every man who has the love of country in his heart wishes to adopt the best means of assimilating these people into our body-politic and investing them, as soon as they are qualified, with the full rights of citizenship.

Mr. Chairman, what I have intended in this disconnected manner to say is this: Give up stickling for the letter of treaty stipulations which the march of events have made it impossible to carry out. Treat the Indian as we should any other problem of like character. Bring him in contact with white people. Make the best trade we can for him while we can. Cut off gradually the money for rations. Increase in great ratio the expenditure for industrial schools upon the reservation. Use the present excellent schools at Carlisle, Hampton, Lawrence, and other places, as training schools for native teachers for the reservation schools, and above all wake up public sentiment on this great question.

I am a believer in the American people whom we represent here. I believe in their honesty of purpose and in their disgust with shams of all sorts, and I am satisfied that when this question is presented to them in its proper light public sentiment will demand an immediate settlement made in honesty and justice. I am sure that if every man in discussing and voting upon this question will only apply to himself the advice of Polonius—

> To thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man,

he will have it in his mind to do substantial honesty and justice to these people.

Mr. LONG. How far do the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] differ from the provisions of what is known as the Dawes bill, just passed by the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. I just spoke on that point. I say the suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois agree substantially with the provisions of that bill, which proposes to throw the land open to settlement by a division in the midst of a large reservation, bringing the whites in contact with the Indians on each side.

Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I listened with very much interest and instruction to the very able address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and although very reluctantly I interrupted him a few times, there were some points on which I did not feel at liberty to interrupt him, and to which I desire now briefly to advert. For this reason I have asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN] to yield me a few minutes to-day.

In regard to the main policy of the education of the Indians, I believe that the gentleman from Illinois and myself are as one. Yet I hardly know what he meant by an expression which he used in answer to a question from me. I asked him whether he did not think the industrial school is the great agent of civilizing the Indian and the true solution of Indian education. In reply to that plain and to my mind very obvious question, he answered:

> You may teach a savage to extract the square root or to calculate the distance from the earth to the sun, but unless he knows before that how to turn his hand, and has character enough to turn his hand, to gain his bread from the soil, your teachings will all be in vain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, nobody has proposed here to teach the Indian in any of these schools to calculate an eclipse, to estimate the distance of the earth from the sun, to extract the cube root, or do anything of that kind. My question related to industrial education. By that I mean the policy of the Government planting a model farm and a model school in the midst of the Indian reservation, contiguous to the Indian himself, where he shall not only have the open book from which he may learn the English language, the language of the country to which he belongs, but where he can see the various operations of industry as they go forward from day to day—the plowman turning the sod, the carpenter in his shop, the mechanic building houses, all these teaching him by example as well as by precept how to live as a civilized man. This is what I mean by industrial education. If that is what the gentleman from Illinois means, then I heartily extend my hand to him.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment for reply, I will say that I would educate the Indian as fast as he will retain or utilize his education. But the trouble is, when you come to the practical part of the question, educate him much or little, industrially or otherwise, the hand of necessity does not rest upon him requiring him to labor that he may live, so that when he leaves the industrial school he is overborne by his savage surroundings and becomes a drone and a vagabond.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That brings me, Mr. Chairman, to speak of a topic alluded to by the gentleman from Illinois—the annuity system. This system rests almost entirely upon treaty stipulations. What does the gentleman from Illinois and what do other gentlemen propose? Are we to abrogate treaties or are we to fulfill them? I believe that the furnishing of rations to the Indians under this annuity system is in many instances an unmitigated curse; if we could do away with it I believe it would be a blessing to the Indian. But here is the treaty; it stares us in the face; we are bound to pay these annuities or to repudiate our contract. Is this nation ready to repudiate its contract? This, however, is what I would do: just as fast as these annuities expire I would remit these Indians, all of them, to self-support, to labor, to work. I would do this just as rapidly as it could by any possibility be done.

That brings me now to speak but for a moment on the Indian land policy. I think that has been wrong; but from my standpoint I believe the preservation of these great unbroken reservations where, in the deep wilderness and vastness, hundreds of miles from civilization, these Indians can hide themselves beyond the reach and touch of the white man, is a hopeless system for the Indians. I think, on the contrary, these great reservations should be broken up, just as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said yesterday, so the touch of civilization should come upon them from every side, from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south.

I would send the railroad with its pulsating life from border to border, that civilization might run along the iron way, bringing with it the newspaper, the school, the church, and the college in their due time, until the Indian should feel he was existing in the touch of civilization, the touch of the white man, the touch of the white schools, the touch of all that goes to make up an English-speaking community.

And I believe for this reason the principle of this bill is correct, as it takes this great Sioux reservation, divides it in two, and sends a great current of civilized life and feeling flowing right through the center of that great wilderness.

That is what we ask. In the same way I should like to see the great mass of the lands now left in the hands of the Indians opened up as fast as it can lawfully be done.

And that leads me to speak on the Oklahoma question. We have heard it treated here, it seems to me, in a spirit that will lead to lawlessness, not waiting the slow, perhaps too slow, movements of the law, but lead men to take the law into their own hands, and do that which we as lawmakers of the country and the executive of the country ought to do in their behalf, that is to open the way to them.

We started right in the last Congress. We provided for the appointment of a commission to negotiate with these Indian tribes and take up and extinguish these Indian titles, in order to open up those Territories to settlement by actual settlers. That was right. But here we stand to-day, on this the 11th day of March, 1886, precisely where we stood on the 3d day of March, 1885, when that became the law. Why do we stand there? What reason is there why we stand there?

The Secretary of the Interior in his report, on page 34, after reciting the amendment of my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] to the appropriation bill of last year, says:

> This provision of law refers not only to the land ceded by the Creeks and Seminoles referred to above, but also to lands ceded by the Cherokees, the status of which is considered herein under the title "The Cherokee outlet."
> The unlawful combinations above referred to have rendered it, in my judgment, unwise to appoint this commission. That which gives security to life and property is the spirit of law. Nothing is more dangerous, more fatal to rights of property and personal safety and public order than a spirit of lawlessness. The manifestations of the latter danger should be checked at all times, until the rule of law becomes the daily rule of conduct for our people.

Now, why unwise? In Heaven's name, when there are hundreds and thousands of men who are clamoring and beating at the doors of the Indian Territory for admission to make homes for themselves and families, why is it unwise to appoint this commission? It would seem to me to be an additional reason why you should hasten the appointment of the commission, that negotiations may be entered upon at once to extinguish the Indian title in order that this vast area of arable lands might be thrown open to settlement and cultivation. Delay makes in the opposite direction. It is no explanation. It is an explanation which does not explain. It is a reason which is no reason. The reason these unlawful combinations have been formed to force themselves into the Territory is an additional reason why, in my judgment, the negotiations should be hastened to completion.

But there is another phase of the question I have not heard alluded to in this question between the cattle syndicate and the Oklahoma boomers, as they are called. It is this: I do not think they should be put upon exact parity of reason. The "boomer" goes in as an absolute trespasser in derogation and denial of the absolute title of the Indian to these lands. We all concede the Indian has a title there. We all concede if they went in there unlawfully they would be trespassers upon that land. They can not go in there in derogation and denial of the Indian title.

On the other hand, the cattle-men who go into the Territory and lease the lands from the Indians, by the very act of entering into the lease admit and affirm to the Indians the title, and the Indian gets the rent of the land.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan what right have the cattle syndicates to affirm any title whatever to the Indians? Two Attorneys-General at least have decided that they can not go there lawfully, and if they go they are trespassers upon the land.

Mr. CUTCHEON. You refer now to the Cherokee strip?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am speaking more particularly now with reference to Oklahoma.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by the treaty by which that portion of the Territory was ceded by the Indians to the United States there was an express condition or stipulation of the treaty that it was to be used for the purpose of settling thereon friendly Indians and freedmen. Therefore, until the United States claims this cession for the purpose embodied in the treaty—that is, for the execution of the object for which it was expressly ceded—the United States has no right there whatever, but it remains in the possession of the Indians.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it does not remain there, nor have they possession of it or undertaken to lease it. There is not a lease there, I can tell the gentleman. It is occupied without the consent of anybody.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have understood that the Government conceded the possessory right of Oklahoma to the Indian tribe.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. At least they have a quasi title.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir; it never has been conceded, nor have the Seminoles ever claimed possession of it, nor ever claimed the right to lease it, nor has it been leased; it is simply occupied by the cattle-men without any authority whatever.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Well, in so far as the Indian has a title, and I suppose it will not be denied by any one that the Indian has some title——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. None in the world in that Territory.

Mr. CUTCHEON. While the "boomers" who go in and take possession are trespassers, not only upon the title of the Government but upon whatever title it may be conceded the Indian has; while, at most, all that can be said of the cattle-men who go in, lease the lands, and pay rent for them, do recognize the title of the landlord, because the tenant is estopped effectually and conclusively from denying the title of the man from whom he obtains his leasehold.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the cattle-men never have claimed to have leased the lands there; they never have paid for the use of the land; it is a trespass upon the land, and nothing more.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, Mr. Chairman, a word further. I am in favor of opening up this country to white settlement. I believe there is more land there than the Indians have any use for or than it is wise they should be permitted to continue to occupy; but I do claim that if it be taken from them it should be done lawfully, in an orderely mode——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is right.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And not in a lawless manner, to encourage lawlessnes; but as law-abiding citizens.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Nobody finds fault with that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And I hope we shall raise our voices in encouragement of the Executive to appoint the commission authorized at an early day, so that it shall go into operation with the view that this country may be opened up to actual settlers without unnecessary delay and in a proper manner.

Mr. BRUMM. If the landlord is a trespasser, the tenant is also a trespasser.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. And the fact is in this case that the Indians have no right whatever to that Territory.

Mr. PEEL addressed the Chair.

Mr. RYAN. I have, I believe, a portion of my time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemon from Kansas has reserved forty minutes of his time.

Mr. RYAN. I reserve that time.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose at the opening of this discussion to take any part whatever in it; but inasmuch as the debate has assumed quite a wide range, inasmuch as I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs that introduced the bill, and inasmuch as I had the honor to be a member of the committee, known as the Holman committee, that investigated the expenditure of the Indian appropriations, I feel it my duty to say at least something upon this very important question.

Before I attempt to discuss the fundamental question of our Indian policy, or our school system with reference to them, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the position assumed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] in regard to the Oklahoma and Cherokee outlet territory. I do not think I misunderstood him—but if I did I hope my friend will correct me—that he stated in advocating a policy that would lead to the opening up of that Territory to settlement under the homestead laws to the white settlers of this country; that he is opposed to taking charge of that Territory against the consent of these Indians; that he is opposed to taking charge of this Territory and opening it up to white settlers without just compensation to the original owners, and that it was in keeping with the spirit of the contract with the Federal Government on the one part and the Indians on the other.

But it is a fact well known to the country, and I presume well known to him, that since the act of Congress referred to by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on yesterday, the act of the Forty-eighth Congress, to appoint a commission to negotiate further in regard to the sale of these lands—I say that it is a historic fact and every one certainly knows that these five civilized tribes, not only the three from which we bought this Territory but also the Choctaw and Cherokee Nations, having an ultimate interest in the sale of the lands, met in solemn convention, each tribe having its delegate in the convention, and by a resolution unanimously adopted declared that they would not further part with these lands to the United States for the purpose of white settlement.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PEEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does the gentleman know that that was a council called at the instigation of the cattle-men, and that there were more cattle-men there than Indians?

Mr. PEEL. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I will state to him that the sworn testimony taken by the committee of which I had the honor to be a member showed to the contrary. They then declared in that convention that they would not consent. If that is true, I desire to know of the gentleman from Iowa how he is going to help himself if he proposes taking charge of this Territory only by consent of the Indians; if they will not consent, how is he going to get it?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I want to state this, so that we may understand each other thoroughly. The question of obtaining consent from these Indian tribes down there is a very different question from what it would have been ten or fifteen years ago. Now every one of these tribes is infested with these cattle-men, and the chiefs and headmen of these tribes are interested in those cattle syndicates. Does the gentleman from Arkansas not know that Chief Bushyhead is himself under the pay of this Cherokee cattle syndicate that has subleased the entire Cherokee strip for $500,000, $100,000 of which goes into the Cherokee fund and the remainder goes to the syndicate? And it is understood, and well understood by everybody, that Chief Bushyhead is one of the beneficiaries by that arrangement, and he appointed delegates from the Cherokee Nation to the council of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. PEEL. I remember very well the question was propounded to a witness on the stand whether this investigation was instigated by Bushyhead. The evidence shows to the contrary. I do not know anything about the relations Bushyhead occupies to the syndicate. That is not for me to discuss. I call attention to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. If he is opposed to taking this Territory without the consent of the Indians, how, if they refuse their consent, is he to get it unless by force?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that if you will strike down those unlawful cattle syndicates and the tribes are no longer dominated by the cattle syndicates, there will be no trouble in getting a reasonable consent from them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will allow me a word in this connection.

Mr. PEEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. The fact is the Cherokee council, without any dissent, consented to that lease and is in favor of it. And yet the case is entirely different from the case of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes. Of course there is a large and powerful party among the Cherokees who are opposed to the lease. And there the interposition of the Government, for the purpose of preserving the public peace, was absolutely necessary with the removal of the cattle and annulment of the lease. But as regards the Cherokee outlet the case is entirely different. The occupation of that by cattle-men is in conformity with the views of the whole people.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does the gentleman claim before this House that that condition of affairs in the Cherokee strip, the occupation and fencing of the lands, the occupancy of that Cherokee strip by cattle syndicates, foreign and domestic, should be allowed to continue when it is illegal, simply because the Indians have consented thereto?

Mr. HOLMAN. I fully agree with the general view of this matter which has been expressed. Every one understands these leases were without authority of law, and the Secretary of the Interior perhaps did not possess the power to confirm them. I will not say anything as to that; but on that point there is a great diversity of opinion. The probabilities are that the Secretary of the Interior did not possess the power; but the fact is that up to the time that some arrangement can be made by the Government with these tribes which will bring about a more satisfactory result there is no necessity for denouncing the administration for an act that is not disturbing the peace, and which is making a wide tract of country productive and fruitful.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to say in response to the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. PEEL. I can not yield further for this, and desire to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me a single remark right there?

Mr. PEEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say it was an open secret in the Indian Territory, as well as elsewhere, that the alleged lease was made so far as the council took part in it by bribery, and obtained by the aid of the chiefs there co-operating with these cattle-men.

Mr. HOLMAN. That might be all true, but still it was unanimously done, it was said, and there has been no proof laid before Congress that any improper influence was exercised.

Mr. PEEL. I am not on the floor for the purpose of defending these leases or the manner in which they were obtained. I fully agree with the gentleman that in nine cases out of ten they were obtained by fraud, and I have long since declared both privately and publicly they are all void. But I was calling the attention of the committee to the fact that the status of Oklahoma does not necessarily run into the question of the propriety of these leases.

While upon that question I desire to reply for a moment to the apparent censure and strictures passed upon the head of the present administration and Secretary of the Interior by my genial friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on yesterday in regard to the omission on the part of that Department to appoint the commission to negotiate with these tribes with regard to these lands.

I well remember the time the act was passed upon this floor. I approved of the law; I approve it yet; and I would be glad to see that country opened up if it could be done in a legitimate and proper way, but I am opposed to doing it by force or stealth. The censure has been passed here on the head of the present administration by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and by other gentlemen who have followed in his wake, that it has violated the law by omitting the appointment of a commission to negotiate with the tribes in regard to the further disposition of these lands.

In addition to the reason given by the Secretary of the Interior in his report, which is that it would be an encouragement of Oklahoma Payne and his mob, there is another reason to be found in the fact, referred to here a while ago, and I think a very conclusive reason, why that commission was not appointed at the time. What common sense would there be in appointing a commission to go and negotiate a trade when the other party with whom we proposed to negotiate had declared in open council or convention that they would not treat with us upon that subject? Again, Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact in the history of this country that immediately after the passage of that act there was a threatened outbreak on the part of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes. That threatened outbreak led to the report of General Sheridan, and that report led to the ejectment of the cattle-men from that country. An attempt on the part of the Government to send delegates at that particular time to negotiate about these lands would have inflamed the smoldering fire in the breasts of those savages.

Mr. RYAN. But this negotiation was to be with the civilized tribes.

Mr. PEEL. Yes; but those fellows to the west of there have something to say about it also. It is a well-known fact to my colleagues on the committee that when we were at Cantonment and at Fort Reno it was considered imprudent and even unsafe to talk to those Indians in regard to removing them from their present reservations even to Oklahoma, which adjoins it. So sensitive are they as to all propositions in regard to changes or removals, that it was thought unwise at that moment to even test their feeling upon the question.

Mr. RYAN. But, if the gentleman will allow me, I will remind him that the law to which he refers, relating to the appointment of a commission, has no relation to the Cheyennes or any of their lands.

Mr. PEEL. I understand that.

Mr. RYAN. It concerns simply such interests as the civilized tribes may have there.

Mr. PEEL. I understand that; but the Arapaho and Cheyenne country adjoins this region on the west, and the very fact of a commission being sent into that region to negotiate further in regard to those lands would operate like wild-fire on prairie grass; it would be a bellows applied to the fire already smoldering in the breasts of the savages. Therefore I think the administration was perfectly justified in withholding the appointment of the commission.

But, Mr. Chairman, time changes the face of things, and it may be proper later to appoint a commission for that purpose. When these people come up of their own volition to cede those lands, then I will be very glad to have it done and to see that country opened up. I know it sounds very well in the ears of some people to propose to open it up at once regardless of these considerations. It would sound very well to the ears of many of my own constituents to say that these lands should be opened up immediately for the benefit of the poor men who want to take up land and establish homes and make bread for their families; but I want to act with prudence and justice in the matter.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman's reason applies to the time last spring of which he speaks, when the military were going there; but would it be equally applicable at the present time? Why should not the commission be appointed now?

Mr. HOLMAN. This was in October.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I wish to suggest that there seems to be a misapprehension about this commission. There was no commission authorized. There was simply authority to open negotiations.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all I care to say now.

Mr. PEEL. This Indian question is one that has never been satisfactorily solved. In all my experience I have known only one class of individuals who had a perfect Indian policy in their own judgment—the men who know nothing about the Indian question, who have never come in contact with the Indian, and have never investigated his peculiar character and the peculiar relation he bears to the white people of this country. The more this question is investigated the more embarrassing it becomes to the mind of any man who attempts to solve it with a view to the ultimate civilization of the Indians. To understand it correctly it is necessary to take a retrospective view of their condition and history. When we first came to this continent we found the Indians a wild nomadic race. They were as free as the birds in the air or the fish in the sea. They knew no restraint except their own will. They were self-reliant and self-supporting on the game of the country. They were buoyant and brave in their way. But, as civilization advanced step by step, they were crowded back, still subsisting on game, until, as that gradually disappeared, they were thrown back for support upon the Government. The result has been the destruction of their self-reliance and they are no longer capable of supporting themselves. Their manhood has been destroyed; their self-reliance is gone, and many of them have become common paupers. The object of all of us, I presume, is to free them from this unfortunate attitude, if possible, at some time in the near future to make them self-reliant and self-supporting. I tell you, gentlemen, this will never be done so long as they can lean upon the Government for support.

The question, then, which presents itself, and the most difficult of all, is what course shall the Government pursue? When we appropriate money which we hold in trust for them, or which we give them as a gratuity, what is the best manner of disposing of it, looking to this object which we all so much desire? Some advocate one policy and some another. Some gentlemen advocate on this floor the interspersing and intermingling of the white race with the Indians. I for one am not ready to subscribe to that policy. If you throw the Indians in one common mass, with the white people mixed up with them, you can not have one law to bear upon the white man and another law to bear upon the Indian. The law must be general and uniform, and the Indian when placed on an equality under the law with the white man will suffer badly; he will not last long under such circumstances. Even if we allot to the Indians their lands in severalty or patent the lands to them in their tribal relations, making them inalienable for all time to come, this will not save the Indians, because while the white man on one side may assist him in cultivating his crops or in following a trade may deal fairly with him in every respect, another white man on the other side may be ready to swindle the Indian out of all that he possesses, keeping him a pauper and a slave by depriving him of the fruits of his labor.

There are other methods proposed. Some persons are in favor of collecting and concentrating the Indians on certain reservations and placing over them a Territorial government. Some are in favor of scattering them over the country on smaller reservations. It is hard to tell which of these systems would prove the most beneficial. I presume no man is ready to say with confidence what would be the result of any system until he can see some of its practical workings.

I for one believe that the most certain way of preserving these aborigines of the country is, when they have learned to work, to place them as far as possible upon reservations—I speak now of those not already on reservations—where a white man at least can make a living by agricultural pursuits. But there is one embarrassment which meets us in carrying out this proposition. The Indian is peculiar; he is superstitious; his fondness for home, his attachment for his native surroundings, is very strong indeed. One superstitious notion of the Indians appears to be that if they are removed by the white people from their native home they will never get another. Whether the country where the Indian resides be a sandy desert or the most fertile land on the continent, his feeling is the same. He is loath to give up his old hunting-ground and his old home. Therefore the obtaining of his consent is a very important factor in this proposition.

I have often thought that if some of the more advanced of the Indian people—some, for instance, of the five civilized tribes—would join delegations on the part of the Government and intermingle with these people it would help to destroy that superstitious aversion to migration; it might induce them to go and look at land of better quality, and in this way, perhaps, their removal would be facilitated.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing upon which I have a firm conviction: whether the Indians remain upon the reservations where they are or be concentrated in some other locality, the first thing is to teach the Indian how to take care of himself. This idea must be instilled into the smallest child as soon as he is able to comprehend it. He must be taught something of the value of property; he must be taught something as to what his hands are made for before you attempt to place him in a higher state of education. The Indian must be taught by practical demonstration and experience that what he is to do is for his own good; that if he accumulates property it is for his own benefit. Until he acquires a taste for the accumulation of property, until he is taught to appreciate the results of his own labor, he will never become self-supporting, because the incentive which prompts you and me and every American citizen to labor for the accumulation of property for our own support will be wanting.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the observation of the gentleman lead him to think that the full-blooded Indian ever can be taught that?

Mr. PEEL. Well, that is a very hard question. I do not know whether it can be done or not. The effort, I believe, has been to some extent successful in some places.

The question of Indian education is one which has attracted the attention of this particular committee of which I have the honor to be a member more than any other branch of the Indian service; and I must say, in all candor, it is the only branch of the Indian problem on which I have any fixed and positive convictions.

My views then in brief are just these. In the last few years we have established schools far remote from the Indian reservations, at Carlisle, for instance, and at Hampton, and various other Indian schools. Now I want it distinctly understood that I am not criticising the capacity or the ability of the teachers, nor do I complain of the character of the work at these various institutions in what I am about to say, but address myself to the result of their work, and that is a failure. I can say without fear of contradiction on the part of any member of the committee to which I have alluded that without a single solitary exception did we find an Indian boy or girl educated at one of these Eastern schools off the reservation, I care not to what extent, who did not in a short time after reaching the tribe relapse back into the savage habits of the tribe unless the Government gave to such Indian an office of some kind by which he or she could make a support. This is not a strange proposition, Mr. Chairman, when properly analyzed. There are but few of the Indian children who leave the tribe for such purposes. There may be but two or three or a half dozen who leave for purposes of education, and the number thus sent is but a drop in the bucket as compared with the balance of the tribe.

These, however, are taken to the schools and are there educated. They are taken charge of by the persons employed for that duty, and they do their work well. I had the pleasure, Mr. Chairman, of visiting the school at Carlisle, and for the teachers at that institution I must say that they are doing remarkably well; but the trouble is they are not doing their work in the right place.

When the pupil is turned loose from the school the Government provides him with means to transport him back to his home among his tribe. Then he comes in collision with the tribal superstitions of his race, and these are stronger than he is, stronger than the teachings of the college or the schools.

The clothing furnished him by the schools soon becomes dirty, greasy, and worn out, and an early and irrepressible conflict comes on between him and his ancestry, until one side or the other is compelled to yield, and of necessity the student, being in the minority, being the weaker party, is bound to succumb, and falls back into the old habits of the tribe, becoming, if possible, a worse Indian than before he was educated. If this be true, and I repeat that in the investigation of the committee it was found to be the case without a single, solitary exception—if this be true, the money spent upon these Eastern schools for the education of the Indian children, notwithstanding that their inventors and founders are entitled to great credit for their philanthropy and charity, is money that is being thrown away.

There is another principle, sir, that applies to this question of removing the children from the reservations and educating them at Eastern schools. There is the humane and moral principle underlying the whole question. It is sufficiently strong to induce me never to give my aid, either by vote or influence, to move another Indian child away from his own people for such a purpose. I know that it goes upon the hypothesis that they are taken away with the consent of the parents, but what kind of consent we are not fully advised.

I remember one instance, and I see my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] before me and I know he has not forgotten it. While we were at the Sac and Fox agency, in the Indian Territory, taking testimony there, a witness was sworn who testified that while some Indian family was gone, either hunting or visiting, on their return they found their children no better than kidnaped and carried to distant quarters where perhaps they would not expect to see them again. They put it upon the ground that it was done by consent; but it was not with the consent of the Indians. The superintendent of the agency there in charge of the school, who participated in the matter, doubtless acted upon the principle that the parent had consented; but in fact no consent had been given, and to describe it in his own language:

I do not want to give up my children to the agent; it tears out my heart.

What member of this House would entertain a proposition for a moment to let one of his children, eight years old, be taken by anybody, missionary or what not, to be carried thousands of miles beyond his State to be educated under this system? And these Indians do not feel like we would upon this question. They do not comprehend anything of the country beyond what they can see. The Indian does not understand geography as well as we do, and can not understand the proximity of a place as we do by the aid of the locomotive, the telegraph, and the newspapers. Therefore it is a moral wrong and should not be tolerated or encouraged.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do you think this has been practiced to any considerable extent?

Mr. PEEL. I am not prepared to say to what extent it is done.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But you are not led to believe that it has been frequently done?

Mr. PEEL. Yes, sir; I have been led to believe that it is done. If we propose to educate these Indian children it is certainly the policy of this Government to use such money as belongs to them—such as may be due them under the treaties—or such money as may be contributed as gifts or gratuities, and place it where it will do the most good both for the Indian and the white man, the object being to raise the Indian beyond his present pauperized condition and make him a citizen.

He can not be restored to his original self-reliance upon the buffalo, the deer, and the antelope, because they have gone. If, therefore, you desire to make him self-sustaining and self-reliant again you must do it upon other principles, by teaching him agriculture, by making him a herdsman, by training him in the arts of domestic life. And then, instead of spending so many thousand dollars annually on these Eastern schools, whose managers no doubt believe they are doing their duty and are conferring a great blessing on the Indians, we should concentrate the means we appropriate on the Indian reservation schools. And there we should teach the children not the sciences merely, but we should commence down at the alphabet; commence with the first principles of self-preservation; that is to say, how an individual is to learn, how to take care of himself, and to acquire something to live upon.

If it is a conceded fact that you can not teach these things to the older Indians, the only hope is to instil them into the minds of the children, who will eventually form a nucleus sufficiently large that the balance of the Indians can not overcome. You require in some way to instruct and educate a class to operate on the savage superstition of the balance; and if you place these schools—these agricultural institutions—right in the midst of the Indians, where they can all learn by demonstration and by sight, not only is an advantage conferred upon the little ones who are educated, but it has a reflex influence upon the older ones around.

On several occasions when we visited these schools on the reservations, when the teachers brought out the children for exhibition, the old ones, the old squaws and bucks, with their haggard faces, came around with apparent delight to hear their children recite their lessons. It evidently had a good effect upon them. That is one thing which can not be done by the schools in the East. We lose that advantage when we apply our money to take the children off the reservations.

Then the limit of the education in these schools ought to be extended. Let education be on a lower grade but disseminate it among a greater number. You can more readily take nine-tenths of the community, either Indians or white people, and teach them to such an extent that they will know something about agricultural pursuits and the acquisition of property and the common rudiments of self-preservation, than you can instruct one in the very highest science known to the American people. And when the pupil instructed in science goes back among his own people he finds he has nothing to do and he is bound to relapse or leave the country. Before the effects of this educational system can be fully felt and utilized we must take hold of the proposition in a practical way.

We must educate enough of these children and take them up hill even if it be at a slow pace. It will be sufficient if you can hold the ground you acquired. It is better to do that than to attempt to go much further in one year and lose it all the next year.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. PEEL. I yield to my colleague from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. PEEL. All the time I have left.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I listened with unusual interest on yesterday to the discussion of the Indian question in its general aspects by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I have been in the habit of regarding these expeditions around the country to visit Indian reservations and Indian schools as a sort of junketing tours out of which not much good was to come. I looked upon them as a sort of pleasant summer trip, but I concede broadly that if the trip of last summer resulted in the conversion of my friend from Illinois to his present status upon the Indian question the money expended was well spent.

The ability with which he discussed this question I regard as marked. Indeed I regard his speech as the most important deliverance that has been made on this subject, except the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I believe to be the ablest document that has been published from that bureau since I have taken any notice of public affairs, and I pause here to express regret that a speech marked with so much ability, so much thought, so practical, containing so much, as I believe, if carried into execution, would result in the promotion of good government in the Indian country, as well as the civilization of the Indians, should have been tainted in the closing portion by an attack on the administration which I think was unmerited and unjustifiable. But it is characteristic of my friend from Illinois to always play his political cards for whatever they are worth; if he ever fails to do it, it is because he either does not get a hand, or does not know how to play it. In this case he did not have the hand, and he did not know how to play the hand he had.

What has been the policy of the Government hitherto in reference to the five civilized tribes? I assert that there is not an Indian treaty from the organization of the Territory to this day that does not recognize the right of these tribes to control their domestic affairs through their tribal and Territorial governments.

True, these treaties cede or grant certain powers to the Government, mainly for the protection and promotion of their own interests and governments, and these powers the Government has exercised usually, if not always, when the Indians required it. So, also, by the treaties certain duties are imposed on the Government, but in the main these duties are discharged only when the tribes require it. To illustrate: By the twenty-sixth section of the treaty of 1866 with the Cherokee Nation it is provided—

That the United States guarantee to the people of the Cherokee Nation the quiet and peaceable possession of their country and protection against domestic feuds and insurrections and against hostilities of other tribes. They shall also be protected against interruptions or intrusion from all unauthorized citizens of the United States who may attempt to settle on their lands or reside in their Territory.

I speak from memory, but I am quite sure similar provisions will be found in the treaties of the other tribes.

A further examination of the treaties will disclose that provision is made for their local governments, patterned after our own, with their governor or chief, their judiciary, and their Legislatures or councils.

To these local governments are confided the domestic concerns of the tribes, to be interfered with only in such cases as the treaties provide for. In some of the treaties, notably the Choctaw treaty of 1866, provision is made for certain classes of white men to go and stay in that country, by complying with the provisions and requirements of the Indian laws. They have gone, very many of them, are there now, and have rights there under the treaty and the Indian laws.

But the moment they refuse to comply with the Indian laws they become "intruders," to use the language of the treaty. Their presence there is "unauthorized," and upon complaints made the Government expels them as is its duty under the treaty.

So also, if white men, whether there with or without authority of law, should stir up domestic strife or engage in hostilities against the tribes, no doubt the power exists under the treaty for the Government to expel them and restore order. It could likewise expel Indians if necessary under similar circumstances. In all such cases the Government has the power to act and it does act.

When trouble sprang up in the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservations, growing out of the presence there of the cattle-men, with an alacrity worthy of a chief magistrate these people with their millions of invested capital were expelled. There was law and a corresponding duty for this action.

How different is the situation in the Cherokee strip. The cattlemen are there peaceable and quiet. They are there by the authority of the Cherokee people, expressed through their legislative body. The Cherokee people derive from them a large revenue. They do not ask their removal or complain of their presence. They allowed them to come there in pursuance of law, enacted by their council in the exercise of the power of managing their domestic concerns as the treaties provide.

Under these circumstances by what authority can the President be held to interfere and expel these men? Are we to assail him because he will not violate the treaties; because he will not interfere with the domestic concerns of the tribes, override their legislative bodies, and usurp power that does not belong to him?

Mr. Chairman, ours is a Government of laws, and our safety and honor is in their observance.

But, sir, this attack recoils upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], because if these leases to the cattle-men are void, if they were in violation of law, they were executed under the Arthur administration. If not sanctioned and encouraged by that administration, which I believe to be true, the leases were not repudiated, nor was any action had to expel these men from the Territory. Whatever wrong there is in this business, we inherited from you.

I submit, therefore, that this assault on the President and the Secretary of the Interior was unjust. I submit that it came with ill grace from the gentleman from Illinois. I submit that though the leases are void no action was required under existing laws by the President, and that any interference with these people in the absence of disturbance or complaints by the Indians would have been unwarranted and unauthorized.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; but I want to yield first to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois yields to me. The Attorney-General of the United States expressly holds that the Cherokee Nation can not lease their lands, that they can not authorize even one of their own tribe to settle on the land known as the Cherokee outlet, and that the removal by the military power of a person, a member of the Cherokee Nation, who had settled upon that land was justifiable and lawful. Again, Attorney-General Garland holds that the Cherokee Nation can not lease those lands, that neither the President nor the Secretary of the Interior can approve any such lease if made, and that such a lease is void. Now, if the lease is void, the parties are trespassers.

Mr. ROGERS. But the Attorney-General has not held that it was the duty of the Government when the Indians permitted those people to go in there to put them out in disregard of the permission of the Indians.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir. Attorney-General Devens expressly decided in the case of Bell that it was the right and the duty of the Government to expel the intruder, although he belonged to the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. ROGERS. That it was the right and the duty of the Government to expel him in violation of the authority and of the wishes of the Cherokee Nation? If Attorney-General Devens ever gave such opinion as that, I should like to hear it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will read the syllabus:

Under article 16 of the Cherokee treaty of 1866 the lands west of the ninty-ninth degree of longitude to which it refers are reserved to the United States upon the conditions there named for the settlement thereon of tribes of friendly Indians. The possession of, and jurisdiction over, these lands until thus disposed of, which are retained by the Cherokee Nation under the same article, give to that nation no right to settle its citizens upon the lands so long as the right reserved by the United States to settle friendly Indians there subsists. Hence, authority to settle there, derived from the Cherokee Nation, is not sufficient:

Held, accordingly, where certain persons claiming to belong to the Cherokee Nation attempted to settle upon the lands mentioned, that their removal therefrom by military authority was justifiable.

Mr. ROGERS. Is that all?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. He further says, speaking of the authority from the Cherokee Nation:

If he had such authority, and the view above taken be correct, the United States in the maintenance of its treaty privilege would have been justified in ejecting him.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, that leaves the subject exactly where I said it did. Let me read the last provision of that treaty:

The Cherokee Nation to retain the right of possession of, and jurisdiction over, all of said country west of the ninety-sixth degree of west longitude until thus sold and occupied—

That is, until the Government had settled friendly tribes upon it, which was the purpose of the original purchase—after which, their jurisdiction and right of possession to terminate forever as to each of said districts thus sold and occupied.

Now, I had not the particulars of this case to which the gentleman has referred, and, unless the opinion goes further than the syllabus, I do not care what the particulars are. The position I assume, and I believe it can not be successfully controverted, is that these Indians have the right and power, under and by virtue of their treaties, to pass such laws as they see fit allowing the temporary occupancy of their lands by white people; and every one of the five civilized tribes is doing it every year and every day; and I say that when, in pursuance of law, in accordance with their own consent expressed by the council of their nation, they permit this to be done, and do not subsequently attempt to have their contract made with these persons rescinded, there is no duty devolving upon the President of the United States under the existing law which requires him to eject these persons from the reservation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman fails to recognize the distinction which exists between the Cherokee strip and the other lands occupied by the civilized nations. I concede that within the limits of their respective reservations which they have not ceded to the United States, their jurisdiction is complete and exclusive. But I maintain that as to the Cherokee strip which has been ceded to the United States for the purpose of settling friendly Indians upon it, Attorneys-General Devens and Garland have both held that these Indians have no right to settle even their own citizens upon it, nor have they any right to lease it to cattle syndicates or to individuals.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not denied either of those two propositions; but I reiterate that when these people, acting with reference to any part of their territory, which they hold either by virtue of the right of possession as guaranteed by this provision, or by virtue of their original ownership, permit persons to go there temporarily as these persons now occupying it as cattle-men are doing, and consent to the temporary occupancy, neither the present Attorney-General nor any of his predecessors has decided that it is the duty of the Government, in violation of the wishes of the Indians, to go there and eject these occupants. It may be sound policy to do so, but no such decision has been made; I respectfully submit it is not the law.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the provision of the treaty which he has read relates to the Cherokee strip?

Mr. ROGERS. Precisely.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does it include anything else?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then it gives them expressly a possessory right?

Mr. ROGERS. It gives them expressly a possessory right by its very terms. And what does possession mean?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Possession in accordance with the terms of the treaty?

Mr. ROGERS. It does not mean that these Indians can settle white men upon those lands, giving them homesteads, and make titles to them, or anything of that sort, because the very terms of the treaty provide that whenever the Government of the United States shall see fit to settle friendly tribes upon that tract of land the right of possession upon the part of the Indians shall cease; but until that is done the right of possession belongs by the very terms of the treaty to the Cherokee Nation. Moreover, the Government was not paid for these lands. I understand a part payment has been made. The Cherokee people claim that payment was fraudulently made. By the terms of the treaty these lands were not to be paid for until the Government had settled friendly tribes upon them. This has not been done. So that the very strongest position the Government can occupy in relation to these lands is that of a vendee, out of possession and only a part of the purchase-money paid. I do not think that ground is tenable. I believe the title is in the Indian still. I will read Judge Parker's opinion on that point hereafter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want anybody to understand for one moment that I have one particle of sympathy either with these cattle-men or with the intruders who have gone there in violation of law. But if we propose to open the Indian country, let us do it in some manly, lawful method.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman from Arkansas to take the position that under the terms of the treaty of 1866 the Cherokee Nation would have a lawful right to lease that Cherokee outlet for any time whatever—for five years or for one day? And in this connection I ask him whether he has examined section 2116 of the Revised Statutes, upon which these opinions of Attorneys-General Devens and Garland are based?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not recollect the section named. But, sir, I need not answer his question; I have already answered it two or three times. The statute states the Cherokee Nation has a possessory right. Now, what is a possessory right if it is not to possess and manage it?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Section 2116 provides any Indian tribe which leases it——

Mr. ROGERS. Now, I am courteous to the gentleman from Iowa, and I should prefer to finish my sentence instead of letting him finish it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Excuse me. I was not aware I was breaking into the gentleman's sentence.

Mr. ROGERS. I will repeat again, the possessory right, by the very terms of the treaty, belongs to the Indian nation. What is a possessory right if it is not a right to possess these lands? The gentleman puts the question to me whether they can convey away their right. What he means by that is whether they can make a contract binding in law. I answer in the negative. It is like an infant who undertakes to deal with an adult; one may be bound, while the other is not. The Indian people, although they made this contract or undertook to make it, the moment they undertake to repudiate it, the very moment they protest against these white men staying there longer, that moment it becomes the duty of the President of the United States to put these white men beyond the limits of the Indian Territory. Until there is some positive law on that subject there is no power or authority in the President, whether the preceding administration or any other administration, to put these men out in violation of the leases of the Indians themselves.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. If the Cherokee Nation has the right to the possession of this Cherokee outlet so far as to make a lease with white men for its occupation for any given time whatever, what becomes of the right ceded by that nation to the United States, by way of treaty, to locate friendly Indians on that Territory? It is not at all probable, I have to say to my friend, that the Cherokee Nation would find fault with that. They would not be prejudiced by it. It would be their interest; but, if I understand him, they have a right to enjoy that possession even as against the United States or anybody else by the terms of their treaty unless they can invoke the Government of the United States to protect them in some way.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I see there is a great deal of misunderstanding as well as misconstruction as to the treaty itself, and I will take the trouble just at this point to read the section of the treaty in full. I have read a portion of it already. It is as follows:

ART. 16. The United States may settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of 96°, to be taken in a compact form in quantity not exceeding 160 acres for each member of each of said tribes thus to be settled; the boundaries of each of said districts to be distinctly marked and the land conveyed in fee-simple to each of said tribes to be held in common or by their members in severalty as the United States may decide. Said lands thus disposed of to be paid for to the Cherokee Nation at such price as may be agreed on between the said parties in interest, subject to the approval of the President; and if they should not agree then the price to be fixed by the President. The Cherokee Nation to retain the right of possession of and jurisdiction over all of said country west of 96° of longitude until thus sold and occupied, after which their jurisdiction and right of possession to terminate forever as to each of said districts thus sold and occupied.

Mr. Chairman, I might undertake to elaborate that for a month, but it is just what it says. It is that and nothing more. It is that they may possess it for any purpose that is legal and proper and not in violation of any law. They may permit other persons to possess it. For instance, they may suffer the hay to be cut from it, as they do in other parts of the Territory, on payment of royalty. They may enjoy it. Possession means enjoyment. But when the Government settles friendly tribes upon it then their possessory right eo instanti ceases and they have no right longer to possess or enjoy it. That is all there is in it, or that can be made out of it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me interrupt the gentleman once more——

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to go on and make some progress with my remarks, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. This is what I wish to say to the gentleman. I wish to be courteous to him, and believe I have been. I beg his pardon for having broken into his sentence. The articles read by the gentleman are the very articles which were before Attorney-General Devens at the time he made the decision from which I have quoted. Let me read what he says. He says:

The fair interpretation of this article would seem to be that the lands to which it refers were absolutely reserved to the United States, upon the conditions therein named, for the settlement thereon of tribes of friendly Indians. The jurisdiction and possession of the Cherokee Nation as to the lands from time to time remaining unsold and unoccupied would give no right to the nation to settle its citizens thereon, until the privilege acquired by the United States to settle tribes of friendly Indians "in any part of the country west of 96°" should be satisfied, or in some authentic way renounced; and this being so, no person attempting a settlement on these lands can justify under any authority given by the Cherokee Nation. On the contrary it is the duty as it is the interest of the nation to prevent its citizens from making such settlement. It appears that Bell produced no evidence that such authority had been given him. But if he had, and the view above taken be correct, the United States, in the maintenance of their treaty privilege, would have been justified in ejecting him.

Mr. ROGERS. I propose to read an extract from a judicial opinion bearing on the legal status of the Cherokee outlet, decided by the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas:

By the sixteenth article of the treaty of July 27, 1866, between the United States and the Cherokees, it was agreed "that the United States may settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of 96°, to be taken in compact form, in quantity not exceeding 160 acres for each member of each of said tribes thus to be settled; the boundaries of each of said districts to be distinctly marked, and the land conveyed in fee-simple to each of said tribes to be held in common, or by their members in severalty, as the United States may decide. Said lands thus disposed of to be paid for to the Cherokee Nation at such price as may be agreed on between the said parties in interest, subject to the approval of the President; and if they should not agree, then the price to be fixed by the President. The Cherokee Nation to retain the right of possession of and jurisdiction over all of said country west of 96° of longitude, until thus sold and occupied, after which their jurisdiction and right of possession to terminate forever as to each of said districts thus sold and occupied."

The plain meaning of this provision of the treaty is that when the United States should desire any of the outlet for the settlement of friendly Indians on the same that the Cherokees would sell the same to such Indians and make title in fee-simple to them for the same; the purchase price to be paid by them or the Government of the United States for them to the Cherokees. But until the country, or any part of it, is so sold and occupied, the right of possession and jurisdiction over all of said country west of 96° of longitude to be retained by the Cherokees. Here is a plain recognition of the title of the Cherokees by the Government of the United States with their right of possession and jurisdiction. Inasmuch as there never was any sale by the Cherokees to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes of the country where this offense was committed, and the same was never sold by them and occupied by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, the country is still in the condition of being set apart and occupied by the Cherokees, and does not come under the designation of Indian country not set apart and occupied by the Cherokees.

Such is the decision of the court on a proper case submitted to it for final judgment. If the gentleman finds it in conflict with the opinion of Attorney-General Devens (I do not think it is) he can take his choice. I believe the opinion of the court is the law of the case upon the question of the right of possession in the Indians. I believe also the contracts or leases to the Indians were void, because any lease for any specified time negates the right of the Government at any time to settle friendly tribes on the lands; in other words, no lease could be made which would nullify the treaty stipulation authorizing the Government to settle the friendly tribes in these lands at its pleasure. But if the leases are void it does not follow that the right of possession and use is not in the Indians, nor does it follow because they are void that it is the duty of the President to put the cattle-men off if they are there by the consent and wish of the Indians. But, after all, take it either way, the President in these matters has only followed the precedents and the practice of the Government ever since the treaty of 1866.

It seems to me, therefore, that the gentleman from Illinois was in a desperate strait for something upon which to attack the administration.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. My criticism was that he failed to obey the mandatory statute of appointing the commission. The other assault I made was incidental to that point; and as to the point the gentleman now makes, I desire to say that if the last administration violated the law I stand ready to condemn it; and the gentleman is not as strong or as ingenious as he usually is when he seeks to excuse the present Executive by reference to the alleged shortcomings of the last one.

Mr. ROGERS. My friend discloses the lawyer by a departure in pleading. It is not, Mr. Chairman, expected of me, I apprehend, to answer but one issue at a time; and I do not expect to let my friend dodge the issue.

I send this record to the desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask to be recognized in my own time. I have been interrupted a great deal. I believe, in fact, I am first on the list on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be permitted to proceed without objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the Clerk to read from this RECORD what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Iowa has answered the gentleman from Louisiana. I wish to make further answer to the question of the gentleman from Louisiana as to whether he did not issue the order to the cattle monopolists to get off the Cherokee lands where they occupied millions of acres in that Territory. I do not recollect whether he did, but if he did he ought to have enforced it. [Applause.] That Executive who had the courage to thrust off the squatters who had settled upon claims in Oklahoma certainly ought to have had the nerve and courage to drive off half a dozen cattle-men who had taken their cattle upon these Indian lands. [Applause.]

And again:

Mr. CANNON. Oh, all times are proper to enforce the law. Why did not the President say to the poor squatter who had taken up his claim in Oklahoma, "I will let you stay over the winter and let your one cow feed upon the grass, but you must get off in spring." My friend, there is no apology for it. He turned the poor squatter off and allowed cattle monopolists to remain. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. That, no doubt, was intended for the Oklahoma "boomers" or some of the gentleman's friends in Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I stand by it now.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well. Mr. Chairman, there is one way that a man can be made to stand by a question, and that is to bring him back to the record. Now, he says my defense should not have been by showing that we had precedents heretofore, but we should have made our defense independent of the practice of previous administrations. Mr. Chairman, precedents are valuable and practice is valuable. The common law itself is made up of long practice and by precedents; and this has not only been the precedent under the previous administration, but it has been the precedent of the Government from the organization of the Indian country down to the present hour; and yet the President and the Secretary of the Interior are to be assailed in this manner because they have simply followed what the other administrations have done heretofore in the same line.

But now I pass to the other consideration of this question. In the Forty-eighth Congress a section was placed upon the Indian appropriation bill authorizing the President to negotiate for the lands included in this particular territory, of which mention has been made in the following language:

The President is hereby authorized to open negotiations with the Creeks—

Observe the language, "is hereby authorized;" not that he shall open negotiations, or may open negotiations, but he is—

Hereby authorized to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees for the purpose of opening to settlement under the homestead laws the unassigned lands in said Indian Territory ceded by them respectively to the United States by the several treaties of August 11, 1866, and March 21, 1866, and July 19, 1866; and for that purpose the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, his action hereunder to be reported to Congress.

Now the gentleman from Illinois, with unusual solemnity and great physical force, asserted yesterday that this statute was mandatory—that is to say, that when a man is "authorized" to do a thing that he "must" do it. Now I take it that he will not be able to find any lawyer who will examine this statute in the light of recognized rules of construction who will undertake to say, in view of this language of the statute, that the President was compelled to open negotiations.

I assert, Mr. Chairman, that this statute is not mandatory; and in the very nature of things it could not be mandatory in that sense in which the term is ordinarily used. You authorize him to open negotiations. How can he negotiate unless there is somebody to negotiate with. These Indian tribes, as was stated by my colleague, met in general council with delegates representing all the five civilized tribes, and by solemn resolution declared they would not take any steps toward the cession of their rights to the General Government. My information from the Interior Department is "that it was not considered wise to appoint the commissioners unless there was reasonable hope that the result aimed at by the law could be accomplished. All the facts and indications appear to be against the successful accomplishment of the end desired, and the commission therefore was not appointed."

But the statute required no commission to be appointed. The manner of negotiating was not specified. That was left discretionary with the President. That perhaps was the usual way to make these negotiations; but it may be done in any manner deemed prudent and feasible by the President.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Would not the best way to have found out whether the object could be successfully accomplished or not have been to appoint the commission and try it?

Mr. ROGERS. That depends upon circumstances. Why appoint a commission when these people themselves had said by resolution in a general meeting of their delegates that they would not negotiate. But on the other hand, if the question was only one of discretion as to whether the commission was to be appointed, then the position assumed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is conceded; because he said it was mandatory. If it was a matter of discretion there was nothing mandatory in it, and the President might have appointed the commission or not as he saw fit.

But the Secretary of the Interior in his report indicates why it was that he thought it was unwise at that period to appoint this commission, and I submit to my friend that whether he was right or wrong this statement of his takes high ground, it takes the correct ground, it takes the ground, in my opinion, which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] ought to take, that is, to discourage these men from undertaking by lawless methods to overrun that Indian country without the authority of law.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if the failure of the President to appoint this commission does not invite lawlessness in that Territory? I understood that law was enacted for the purpose of preventing lawlessness.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That was the object of the law.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will possess his soul in patience he will find that I will come to that.

Mr. BLAND. I have been possessing my soul in patience. I have not interrupted the gentleman before to-day.

Mr. ROGERS. I will read what the Secretary of the Interior says—as I was about to do when last interrupted.

The unlawful combinations above referred to have rendered it, in my judgment, unwise to appoint this commission.

Now, who was to determine whether it was wise or not? Suppose the gentleman from Missouri, or the gentleman from Illinois, or my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] all thought it would have been wiser to have appointed the commission, should the President have acted on the advice of those gentlemen, or on the advice of the distinguished gentleman who presides over that Department, and whose duty it is to know all the facts? Should he have asked them for their advice in their distant homes in Illinois, Michigan, and Missouri? The Secretary proceeds:

That which gives security to life and property is the spirit of law. Nothing is more dangerous, more fatal to rights of property and personal safety and public order than a spirit of lawlessness. The manifestations of the latter danger should be checked at all times, until the rule of law becomes the daily rule of conduct for our people.

The lands reserved for the accommodation of the Indians are undoubtedly much larger in extent than is needed for their wants and accommodation.

All through this report there is breathed on the part of the Secretary of the Interior a desire to see the interests of these people promoted and that country opened, not rapidly as you and I might wish, but nevertheless to have it opened to civilization and settlement by white men as soon as it can be safely done.

He continues:

There can be no harm in recognizing the gradual current slowly tending in the direction of civilized occupation and use of the Indian Territory as the Indians themselves become consolidated upon fewer residential points; but rapacity and lawlessness will not abide the gradual and gentle method of change, and seek by violence and forcible invasion to displace law and treaty and the sense of obligation to both, and ride rough-shod into possession of the lands of the Indian reservations.

Will it not be a lesson, valuable there and valuable elsewhere—

Valuable, Mr. Chairman, in this Chamber—to show such transgressors that their way is hard, and that nothing will render the Indian occupation more permanent, or postpone the change in the use of these lands longer, than the attempts to invade and by force to obtain possession and enjoyment of them? The outlaws and depredators who imagine they can override the law and violate treaty obligations with the Indians will discover the impossibility of success when they find themselves confronted by the law of the land, strengthened by the civil and military arm, and backed by the moral sentiment of a just people.

Whether we concur with these sentiments of the Secretary of the Interior or not, they take a high ground—ground that insists upon the observance of the moral obligations and the good faith and the duty that we owe to these people by virtue of the terms of the treaty.

But, Mr. Chairman, at the time this law was passed these boomers were assembled on the border of Kansas ready, if anything was done, to swoop down upon this country and take it all up as rapidly as possible. And the very result and effect of these negotiations for the accomplishment of that end, if successful, was to give these men who had by unlawful combinations undertaken to override this country the absolute control instead of giving the whole country, including those who in a patient and lawful spirit had bided their time, clearly showing their desire to observe the requirements of the treaties and laws of the country, an equal chance for homes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The view expressed by the gentleman from Arkansas is well illustrated in this fact: That the class of persons to whom he has referred were assembled on the southern boundary of Kansas, entered the Indian Territory, established themselves on the North Fork of Canadian River, laid out a town—not one settlement only, but more—on the theory that this Government was intending to open up the territory to white settlers, and they intended to get the best settlement they could obtain.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. I wish now to proceed for a little without interruption. So that, Mr. Chairman, not only as borne out by the language of the Secretary of the Interior, but as sustained by the chairman of the subcommittee whose duty it was to investigate that Indian Territory, the action of the Government under these circumstances would have had the appearance of retreating in the face of these people who were seeking to violate the law. I, for one, sir, will go as quickly and as rapidly by proper roads to accomplish the end desired by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as any one, but I do not propose to go over law, over the decisions of the court, and over treaty stipulations to accomplish it, in the way chosen by those persons who banded together on the borders of Kansas.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what has been suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I wish to protest against it being understood in this House that the poor men who assembled on the border of the Indian Territory, with a view of locating their families on lands in that Territory, were lawless men. They were from the States of Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and Iowa, and to my personal knowledge a large majority of them were just as law-abiding men as this country affords. When the President of the United States ordered them to leave the Territory they left. Not only that, but I protest against this assault upon those poor people when it is known that the cattle syndicates of this country are occupying that Territory in violation of law. When those corporations are occupying those lands in disregard of the law and of the decisions of two Attorneys-General of the United States it is no time to denounce as lawless the poor men who were trying to go in there to make homes for their families, and I protest against it. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. "Oklahoma" Payne uttered pretty much that kind of sentiment in my town two or three years ago. He said he was not lawless, but the district court declared upon solemn judgment that he was a law-breaker and convicted him of the offense. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] says those men were not lawless. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to concede that many of them were duped and did not know what they were doing; but the leaders understood it because they had been taught it by the law and by the action of the courts. They knew that they were law-breakers when they returned into that country, having been already convicted of it in the courts. The rank and file may have been ignorant; assume they were; still their enterprise was no less unlawful. And a word just here. If they had no right in the Indian country, and the Indians did not choose to suffer them to go there, and under the treaty called upon the President and had them put out, what right have they got to demand that the Indians turn the "cattle syndicates" (as the gentleman stigmatizes them) out of the Territory if the Indians were willing they should stay? It is the dog-in-the-manger policy. The argument is, you won't let me stay, and therefore I don't intend you shall let anybody else stay.

That kind of an argument will do for a political hobby; but it is unsound and illogical. The logic of the situation is, that I have no rights there, and therefore I have no business intermeddling with other people who are there.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from California.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MILLER, and that, as a mark of the respect entertained by the Senate for his memory, his remains be removed from Washington to California in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate the foregoing resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. JONES, of Nevada, Mr. FRYE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. GRAY, as said committee.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to convince the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] that these men were lawless and were law-breakers. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and at the last session of Congress I published a letter from the district attorney of that district, setting forth in substance these same facts. This is the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

Payne, with a number of old offenders, was arrested and sent to Fort Smith, Ark., where they were turned over to the United States marshal September 8, 1884. There, it is understood, Payne was released upon his own recognizance of $1,000 and turned loose, and the commanding general reported that he was back at Hunnewell organizing another expedition for the Indian Territory before the troops who took him to Fort Smith could return.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that Payne and every other man arrested there begged and pleaded with the courts and with the district attorney for a trial?

Mr. ROGERS. And he got it, and was convicted, and he was indicted in the same court when he died.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Payne was convicted?

Mr. ROGERS. Payne was convicted.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The court expressly held that Payne had not violated any law.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, that is a question of fact, and I presume I am about as well posted on that subject as the gentleman from Iowa, as I happen to live in the town in which the court sat; and, as I have said, I published in the RECORD at the last session of Congress a letter from the district attorney substantially setting forth what I have now stated. Here is the letter. I will publish it:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Fort Smith, Ark., February 1, 1885.

DEAR JUDGE: Your favor of the 28th ultimo relating to the Payne cases is duly received. Payne was not convicted under a criminal statute, but at the time of his death there was a criminal suit pending against him for introducing spirituous liquor into the Indian country. There was also at that time a civil prosecution pending against him for the enforcement of a penal statute against intruders in the Indian country. (Revised Statutes, sections 2147 and 2148.) Prior to this time two other civil suits for the enforcement of this penal statute had already gone to judgment, one at the term preceding Payne's death and the other some two or three years before. The first of these suits was hotly contested, prominent lawyers from Saint Louis being sent here to argue it.

The way the criminal proceeding came to be instituted was because at the time of Payne's last arrest he pointed out to the officers some whisky which he said he had introduced, and that he defied the Government to proceed against him for that; that in such a proceeding the question would be directly raised as to whether the country he and his followers were settling was in the Indian country.

When he was brought here, and I was informed of this matter, I concluded to accommodate him, and filed the information charging him with the introduction. He then made an application to the court for a continuance of the case on the ground of an absent witness, by whom he alleged he could prove that he did not bring the whisky in, but that it was brought by another. I had announced myself ready for trial, and was perfectly willing to try the issue in that way. The case was continued on his motion.

This suit, together with the third and last civil action, abated at his death. At the time the last civil suit was brought against Payne there were suits of the same character brought against each of some twelve or fourteen of his followers. These have all gone to judgment within the last few days.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. H. CLAYTON.

Hon. J. H. ROGERS,
Washington, D. C.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs proceeds as follows:

He was succeeded by one W. L. Couch, under whose leadership, in the latter part of December, 1884, a large body of armed men again entered the Territory with the avowed object of effecting a permanent settlement, encamping at Stillwater, on the Cimarron River, whence they defied the military to remove them. Couch, the leader, was reported as willing to risk a collision with the troops, as likely to arouse public sympathy and compel favorable action by Congress in opening the coveted lands to settlement.

Mr. Chairman, I will not undertake to read more of this. It appears then that not only were these men lawless in their intrusion, but, by the terms of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, it appears that Couch, their leader, the successor of Payne, announced that he was ready for a collision with the United States troops, the object being to force this matter upon the attention of Congress and to secure legislation.

Mr. Chairman, is that the way we are to be prompted to legislate here? Are these the influences under which the American Congress is to be induced to legislate? But I go back for a moment to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. He says the law is mandatory. Let us concede, for the sake of the argument, that it is mandatory. When is it mandatory? Was it the day after the passage of the law? Was it four weeks after the passage of the law? Was it six weeks, ten weeks, twenty weeks, six months, or forty years? When was it mandatory?

Mr. CANNON. The appropriation which you carried will last until the 30th of June; and it was the intention of Congress that the treaties should be modified as far as they could be by the President, and a report made to this Congress for action here.

Mr. ROGERS. The appropriation was only available on the 1st day of last July, so that there is a good long period of time within which this negotiation may take place, if it is found proper and right under all the circumstances that it should take place. So, then, to sum it all up, in the first place, there was nothing mandatory; in the second place, if the act was mandatory, the time within which it was to be executed has not expired, and the President may exercise his own discretion as to when within that period he will undertake to execute this law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, leaving that branch of the subject, I have but little more to say. I have only undertaken to do justice to the administration in this matter. I desire now to allude very briefly to another branch of this subject.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that last spring there was some proclamation about removing cattle-men. I would like to know, now that these settlers are removed from that Territory, whether the cattle-men are away. If not, why not?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know whether the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has been in his seat during the time I have been addressing the committe or not; but I have discussed that subject fully, and I hope he does not want me to discuss it again. So far as concerns all the Territory except the Cherokee outlet, the cattle-men, as I understand the fact, have been put out of the Territory.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. RYAN. Not at all.

Mr. ROGERS. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. They have only been removed by the Government where the disturbance occurred, where an appeal was made to the Government by the Indians—the Cheyennes and Arapahoes.

Mr. ROGERS. There were two places, as I understand, where these cattle-men had congregated. One was upon the portion of country assigned to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes; the other was in the Cherokee outlet. If there were any other parts of the Territory which have been occupied by the cattle-men, of course my remarks do not apply. I am discussing only that part of the question which relates to the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation and to the Cherokee outlet. I do not discuss any other branch of this question because I have not investigated it. I should not have discussed these points but for the unjust attacks of the gentlemen from Illinois and Iowa on the administration.

But I have said, so far as the Cherokee outlet is concerned—and I repeat my statement now for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri—the President has no power under the law to put these people out so long as they are peacefully there with the consent of the Cherokee Nation. That is all I desire to say upon that point, except that I presume the others are there under similar conditions.

I now turn to another branch of the subject. It has been said that these people came from Missouri and Kansas and Arkansas. I do not know where they came from; I am utterly indifferent about that. Many men from my own State and from my own district have written to me repeatedly in regard to the opening of this section of country. In discharge of what I regarded as a public duty as well as an obligation of personal friendship, I have told them that if they should go there they would be violators of law; that as yet there was no authority of law for their occupying that region. I have, on the other hand, invited their attention to the fact that the great drift of public sentiment is toward the opening of that country, and that as good citizens they ought to bide their time and take their chances when the law shall have appointed peaceful and lawful methods of accomplishing their desires. I commend that advice to the consideration of those gentlemen who are making speeches here urging people to go into that country in violation of law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Who has done that?

Mr. ROGERS. I take it the great part of your speech was in that direction.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I expressly took occasion to say that I did not want any man to go there in violation of the rights of the Indians; that I desired the Indian title should be first extinguished. It is very strange the gentleman from Arkansas should make such a remark as he has just uttered.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw the remark. I accept, of course, the statement the gentleman now makes. But I understood that the great point of his argument was that the Government owned the land and these people had a right to go there.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw the remark; I will not do the gentleman any injustice; but that was my understanding.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Then the gentleman has been ffghting the air. I wish to make this supplemental remark: All I insist upon is that the Government shall treat alike the cattle syndicates and the other people who undertake to go in there; shall keep both classes out until they can go in lawfully.

Mr. ROGERS. Give the President the law, and my word for it in thirty days you will not find the cattle-men there. You ought to know this. When he felt he had the right he expelled the others.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The President has the authority now, or else his own Attorney-General is wrong. The law adviser of his Cabinet has decided that these leases are invalid. Why does not the President issue a proclamation and drive the cattle syndicates out? He does not pretend that they have any legal right there; no officer of the Government has so pretended.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope I may now be permitted to proceed without further interruption; for I am nearly through. I have no doubt the gentleman from Iowa thinks the President has the power; but somebody else must determine that question. I have no hope of convincing him. His mind is not on law, but syndicates, and men will differ upon questions of law and questions of power. I wish to say that so far as I am personally concerned I indorse the views of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] with reference to the duty of the Government in relation to the Indian policy generally; and I am not a new convert on that subject. I did not learn what I know about it by a trip to the Indian country last summer; I have learned it by some fifteen years of study in close contact with these people.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Always.

Mr. CANNON. I would remind the gentleman that all of us have not been so fortunate in our opportunities for information as the gentleman from Arkansas, and it is better to learn even late in life than not to learn at all.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true; and I congratulate my friend upon his having learned something of the Indian question last summer.

I said last session, and I want to repeat it now, that in my opinion the way to develop the Indian country and civilize the Indians is to carry your education of them hand in hand with labor; teach them how to work and give them education at the same time:

> Going hand in hand with this is citizenship, courts, and laws. It is coming to this. We know it. They know it. It is their interest to accept the situation. It is our duty to protect them by humane laws. Sir, it is a favorite theme of sentimentalists that we must hold sacred the treaties; that good morals demand it. Sir, good morals demand, wise statesmanship dictates, and sound public policy requires that we should establish a humane and an honest government in that country, that life and property should be made safe, that peace and order should be maintained. Sir, I would do these people no injustice; I would lift them up by the adoption of a wiser, a more humane, a more honest policy to a higher plane of Christian civilization. Sooner or later it will be done, and the sooner the better for them and for us.

In this lies the correct solution of the Indian question. So long as by lavish appropriation we maintain these people as paupers, whether educated or uneducated, we will have no civilization of them. That is my conviction. The fact is, when you educate him he goes back to his own people and he must take on their customs and habits and methods and ways of living or he is an alien in his own country, ostracised by his own people. We must teach them to work, and at the same educate them. This should be done at their homes. Then we must give them courts and give them law; we must give them law that means protection of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness. I will read again from what I said at the last session. I quoted from the work of a distinguished philanthropist, as follows:

> Doing things for and giving things to people does not lift them up, if the doing and the giving do not spring a new hope, a new aspiration, a new purpose in them, or in some way vivify into fruitful life some dormant good already in their souls. The test of our usefulness to others is to be found in their character. Do we make them wiser, stronger, braver, truer? Then we have lifted them up by helping them to grow out of their weakness and evil into their strength and goodness. Why is it better to give a poor man a day's work than a day's rations without work? The one gift lifts him up, the other pauperizes him. In all our plans and efforts to lift up the negro, let us remember that our best help to him is whatever most effectually enables him to help himself.

Then I added:

> Sir, this race must be taught to lay aside the hunting-rifle and take up the hoe and the chopping-ax. The Indian will never learn this lesson in schools and colleges. If the few we educate did learn it, when they return to their own people they must go back to their habits and customs, advocate the measures that are popular among the dominant element, right or wrong; doff the spike-tail coat, and stove-pipe hat, and don the hunting-shirt and the navy-six, or they are practically ostracised by their own people. To teach these people to work it must be made honorable among them. The way to make it honorable is to bring them in contact with whites who do work, who desire to improve their condition, who want churches, schools, farms, and homes, and laws that are respected because humanely enforced.
> There is a solution of this Indian problem in the Indian Territory. We are upholding these rotten governments there under the pretense of civilizing the Indians. We justify our conduct by clinging to treaties that have served their purpose, and were never intended as anything but temporary expedients. We expected the time would come when the logic of events would enforce a different condition for them. We knew by past history that in the march of civilization these Indian governments must give way.

I was delighted yesterday, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] came squarely up and recognized the fact that these treaties with the Indian tribes were but expedients for their civilization. They are simply instrumentalities. They have served their purpose so far as the five tribes are concerned. The power is with Congress, and its duty in the interest of good morals, good government, their civilization and development, is to destroy the present systems of government in that country, and give them a government that will afford protection to life and property. By wise legislation bring them in contact with the whites, not as now, with fugitives from justice from other States and the bad and lawless elements congregated there, but with the sturdy, honest farmer and mechanic, who works and is contented with work and a quiet and peaceful home and family. When this is done, their real civilization will begin. Such is the experience of all. It is the testimony of your committee, who have visited the tribes in the great West and seen the results of our present policy.

This does not mean the deprivation of their lands. It does not mean spoliation. All this can be, and should be, scrupulously cared for, and their every right carefully guarded by law. Such I believe our duty, and nothing short of this consists with wise statesmanship and national honor.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, the general debate on this bill has now been protracted for three days, sufficiently long. I therefore move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole for the future consideration of the bill, all general debate be limited to sixty minutes—one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN TESTIMONY.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to offer a resolution for present consideration on behalf of the select committee to investigate certain telephone matters.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed under House resolution of February 26, 1886, to make inquiry as to certain matters relating to the Pan-Electric Company and the Bell Telephone Company have leave to have printed for the use of the committee the testimony taken by it and such documents and papers relating to matters referred to it as it may require.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is this the unanimous request of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to state that he asked it on behalf of the committee.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is it the unanimous request of the committee?

Mr. BOYLE. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it not be proper to change the form of the resolution so as to provide for the printing of a certain number of copies for the use of the committee?

Mr. BOYLE. The desire is to have the testimony printed as it is taken day by day so that the committee may have the use of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that the usual custom has been to provide that the testimony be printed, and that a hundred or fifty copies be printed for the use of the committee. This will enable the committee to have the testimony before it day by day for comparison by the witnesses, and also at the end of the term, when the committee has finished its investigation, the matter will be all in print.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is all proper.

Mr. SPRINGER. The order should be that the testimony be printed, and fifty extra copies for the use of the committee.

Mr. BOYLE. I will so modify the resolution.

The resolution as modified is as follows:

Resolved, That the testimony to be taken by the select committee appointed under House resolution of February 26, 1886, to make inquiry as to certain matters relating to the Pan-Electric Company and the Bell Telephone Company be printed, together with such documents and papers relating to the matters referred to said committee as it may consider necessary, and that one hundred extra copies thereof be printed for the use of the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BOYLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request of this morning for unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill 4493 for the purpose of putting the same upon its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the bill?

Mr. BEACH. I must maintain my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

FUNERAL OF HON. JOHN F. MILLER.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the resolution reported from the Senate concerning arrangements to be made for the funeral escort of Senator JOHN F. MILLER, of California, contemplates that similar action be taken on the part of the House, and that a committee be appointed to co-operate with the Senate committee in accompanying the remains to California. I therefore offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to accompany a similar committee appointed by the Senate to escort the remains of Senator JOHN F. MILLER from Washington to California.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. ERMENTROUT for five days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GROUT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw papers filed by George W. Kingsbury in support of House bills 3805 and 5194, reported adversely in the Forty-eighth Congress, without leaving copies on file.

On motion of Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL, by unanimous consent leave was granted to withdraw papers in the case of M. E. Urell without leaving certified copies.

And then, on motion of Mr. WELLBORN (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GOVERNMENT PIER NEAR LEWES, DEL.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause an examination to be made of the "Government pier" on the Delaware Bay, near Lewes, in the County of Sussex and State of Delaware, with the view of ascertaining the probable cost of completing the superstructure thereof wholly of iron, so as to render the same available for the interchange of traffic and promotion of commerce, as contemplated by the act of Congress authorizing its construction, and that he furnish to the Senate as early as practicable an estimate of the cost of so completing the same.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the necessary funeral expenses and those of transporting the remains of the late Hon. JOHN F. MILLER to the State of California, as set forth in the resolution of March 11, 1886, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee and audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the law and rule require that such a resolution shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, unless by unanimous consent the Senate otherwise order.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I intended to ask—unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution at this time. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I take this opportunity to ask to be excused from service on the committee appointed to attend the remains of the late Senator

MILLER to California. I have received information since I was appointed which makes it absolutely impossible for me to go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withhold action for the present upon the request of the Senator from Maine.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANIES.

Mr. PIKE. On the 2d of March I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate postponed indefinitely the bill (S. 346) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1867, and the bill (S. 62) enlarging the powers of the Washington Safe Deposit Company, and for other purposes. I desire the reconsideration at this time for the purpose of moving a recommitment of the bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the bills named by him were indefinitely postponed. If there be no objection the order of the Senate indefinitely postponing these bills will be reconsidered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PIKE. I now move that the bills be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House accepts the invitation of the Senate, and will attend in a body the funeral services of the late Senator JOHN F. MILLER, of California, in the Senate Chamber, on Saturday, March 13, at 12 m.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5218) to provide an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city; and

A bill (H. R. 3039) to refund to Denton & Sage, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $1,549.67, duties paid on sixty hogsheads of sugar.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is in order under the eighth rule.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the formal morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 149.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business being closed, the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SPOONER to section 2 of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not design in any respect to impugn the good faith of the Senator from Wisconsin. That is to say, I have no doubt he desires the passage of this bill and that the purpose which he has in mind in the presentation of the pending amendment is entirely justifiable from his standpoint. But I desire to explain to the Senate why I am constrained to oppose it.

This bill is a bill for peace. It is for the purpose of settling a controversy which can never be settled finally until it is settled in the courts. It provides an absolutely impartial tribunal for the purpose of settling the rights of every person, the Government included, to the lands which are the subject of controversy.

The Senator from Wisconsin has stated to me privately, what I have no doubt he will state publicly, that the amount of lands which have been certified to the State of Iowa for the benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company and which have not been certified or patented to the railroad company, which as he claims are in controversy between the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Company and the Sioux City and Saint Paul Company, is about 17,000 acres. They are the lands that naturally came in conflict between these two companies by reason of the intersection of the routes of the companies at the point named in the statute granting the lands.

But there is one insuperable objection to this amendment to which no allusion, I think, has been made, and that is this: These lands are described in the bill as the lands which were patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company. That expression is used, not for the purpose of stating a fact, but for the purpose of describing the land. The fact is the title to the lands is not in the State of Iowa. The State of Iowa by its Legislature on the 27th day of March, 1884, as disclosed in the report accompanying this bill, reconveyed to the United States all these lands. It held them only as a trustee. But by the law applicable alike to both companies these lands are bound to go through the hands of the State of Iowa in order that they may finally become the property of the company, unless Congress shall prescribe some other way.

Therefore we must provide now some way whereby these lands may go to those several companies if they are to get them, or they will never get them; that is, a new way, or to reaffirm the old way. In other words, no court now, upon the state of facts as it exists at this moment, can give to either one of these railroad companies one single acre of these lands. The judgment which may be obtained in the case which the Senator from Wisconsin speaks of, now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, will absolutely be nothing more than an arbitration. It can have no legal effect whatever as determining what is to become of these lands. They can not pass out of the United States until Congress shall have legislated upon that point. I do not mean to say as a matter of fact that even if the Interior Department were now to certify these lands to the State of Iowa, the Legislature of Iowa would not authorize their conveyance to these companies until these issues were determined by a court. This has become the subject of discussion in that State, and the result of the discussion is shown by the action of the Legislature in declining to authorize the conveyance of these lands to the railroad company and to their reconveyance of them to the United States. Therefore, we are to deal with this as a new question so far at least as the title of the lands is concerned, and we must now provide de novo as to how that title shall be settled and how it shall pass from the United States if it is to pass at all.

So it is just as essential to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, as claimants for these lands, that there shall be affirmative legislation providing for the determination of their rights and of some way of passing the title to whatever lands they may substantiate their claim to, as it would have been if no legislation had ever been passed.

As I said, this is a bill in the interest of peace. Ever since I have been a member of the Public Lands Committee there has been before that committee at every session of Congress what is known, and what has now become still more famous, as the Des Moines River land case, a case in which Congress sought by legislation to remedy some of the wrongs, or mistakes, or errors, or whatever you may call them, that had grown out of the administration of the act giving lands to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River; and every time Congress acted it made the case worse, until finally we were driven as a last resort to send the question to the courts in order that the issues might be settled in such a way that we could legislate intelligently for the purpose of determining whether it involved the United States, or to recognize the wrong it had done and respond in damages or otherwise.

The situation in regard to these lands is very similar, and no settlement which is not final, as only a judicial determination can be, will prevent the State coming here year after year and year after year until finally we shall do that perforce which we ought to have done in the inception of the controversy.

I do not say that the Senator's amendment has any wider scope than he attributes to it, but I suspect that it would prove to be a Trojan horse. I fear so at least. I do not mean to say that I think there would be collusion between these two railroad companies. It is not necessary to lay such a broad foundation as that to oppose the amendment. The mere suggestion that such might be the case illustrates the unwisdom, I think, of legislation which would not only permit it but would give legal effect to it.

Is there any reason why lands which were granted twenty-two years ago and which have not yet passed to the railroad company, and which by reason of various occurrences set out in the report have finally come back from the State of Iowa to the National Government, should not now be made the subject of contention to ascertain exactly where the title is or where it ought to be? I know the Senator from Wisconsin is sufficiently assured of the rightfulness of the claim of the company in whose interest he has proposed the amendment not to doubt for an instant that it can maintain its claim to these lands in the courts. If that be true, then it runs no risk in the premises; and if it be not true, then he would be the last man in the world to stand here and say that it ought to have that by reason of legislation which it can not get by litigation.

Mr. President, every time we touch one of these land-grant questions there are exposed controversies and contentions about title not only of the most serious kind, but of a kind that affect the people in the communities in which the controversies exist. We are on the threshold now confronted with the necessity of settling these questions that have arisen during nearly forty years of administration of the General Land Office, and we ought to settle them in such a way that at once when we have passed a law it shall be the end of controversy, or if controversy remains it shall only be a controversy to be submitted to the courts, whose judgments once rendered are final. It was because not appreciating the situation the Congresses of 1861 and 1862 and on to 1873, that dealt with the Des Moines River question, that dealt with it in such a way that every time they touched it they left it in a worse condition than it was before.

The bill is so fair that no one has yet attacked its structure, that no one has yet assailed its purpose, and no one has denied that the machinery of it was ample and as perfect as human ingenuity and human language can make it to accomplish the purpose of settling this discussion. Can any one object to that? Is there any one whose rights are so sacred that, though in a condition not to be settled unless we legisislate one way or the other, he will not willingly submit those rights to be adjudicated on by the courts of the land? I think not; and I think it is not to the interest, if I may presume to say so, of the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company, or of any other company, to interpose for one single moment to prevent the passage of this bill, or to in any way amend it so that it shall be shorn of any of its jurisdiction with regard to any of the lands which are the subject of controversy, and which by the action of the Legislature of Iowa, have been reconveyed to the United States, and, therefore, the title being perfect in the Government after all this time something must be done which will take that title out.

It is because I believe this bill will promote a just settlement; it is because I know that until a just settlement is made and one which shall have back of it the fiat of the courts, there will be no settlement worth the name in that section of country, that I have assisted in drawing, have reported from the committee, and that I advocate the passage of, the bill; and I think that it would fall short of accomplishing the purpose it has in view, either for the main object which induced its presentation or for that which the Senator from Wisconsin has in view, if it were amended in any essential particular as he proposes to amend it.

Therefore, as I said, this bill representing the judgment of two separate committees of this body, that is the Public Lands Committee at two separate Congresses, confessedly without objection so far as its object is concerned, and with only the objection that it may possibly trench too far in the direction indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin—this bill as it came from the committee ought to receive the sanction of the Senate in order that it may speedily become a law.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I realize very fully the strength of the combination created by the union of the two Senators, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and the Senator from Iowa, against the pending amendment, and I should despair of its adoption by the Senate if I did not think I knew that it ought to be adopted. I can not permit even the Senator from Kansas, for whom I have great respect, to make against the amendment a false issue. He has no right to intimate the possibility that my statement that I was in favor of the bill with this amendment was not made in perfect good faith.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator understood me to intimate that he was not acting in perfect good faith at every step, he misunderstood me entirely.

Mr. SPOONER. I stated to to the Senate yesterday as I state to the Senate again to-day, that regarding the bill as a bill of peace, affording an appropriate tribunal for the trial and determination of the controversy which I conceive to exist as to the company named in the bill, which it is alleged has defaulted, I shall vote for the bill with this amendment. The Committee on Public Lands has not passed upon the amendment. The Committee on Public Lands has not considered the amendment, either at the last Congress or at the present Congress. I do not know until the subject was introduced into the Senate yesterday, that any member of the Committee on Public Lands, except its chairman, had ever considered the phase of the question which is presented by the amendment. The bill had been reported to the Senate before the gentlemen who are interested in the amendment and ask to have it adopted for their protection knew of the bill at all, and they have had no hearing upon it. Although they have grave interests at stake in it they have had no hearing upon it before the Committee on Public Lands. So the opinion given against it by the chairman of the committee today is not the opinion of the committee, but is his own opinion simply, which I admit is entitled to great weight.

Now if Senators will take the trouble to look at the report submitted by the Committee on Public Lands, if they will take the trouble to read the speech, very full and very accurate, which the chairman of that committee presented to the Senate in favor of the bill when he called it up, they will find that the phase of it which I am presenting to the Senate is not considered either in the report or in the speech.

Mr. President, the fact must be admitted that this bill involves lands patented to the State of Iowa for the use and benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railway Company which the courts have decided belong to another company. Because the Government of the United States has a controversy with the Sioux City company on account of its failure to complete its road, why should the Senate of the United States involve in the proposed litigation lands which the court shall decide—and that the highest court in the United States—belong to another company which completed its road within the time prescribed?

There are two phases to this bill. One is the controversy which the Government has with the Sioux City and Saint Paul company, and the other is the relation of the Government to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company. I stated to the Senate yesterday—and I have the certificate here before me—that the governor of Iowa under the great seal of that State certified that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company completed its road to the intersection point within the time, and in strict accordance with the act of the Iowa Legislature and with the act of Congress. What reason has the Senator given to the Senate why the lands earned by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company should be involved in this litigation? He has given none, and I think that he can give none.

The Senator from Kansas suggested that these lands had been already certified or conveyed back by the State of Iowa to the Government of the United States. He is mistaken. The very act of Iowa which authorizes the governor of that State to convey back certain lands to the United States excepts the lands in these counties, Dickinson and O'Brien.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate any further in discussing this amendment. I have submitted it in good faith, and I think it ought to be adopted. Its language is not susceptible of misconstruction. It simply proposes—and that is the whole of it—to take out of the litigation proposed by this bill such lands as the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide have been earned by this other company. Unless some other reason is given to the Senate than has been given why these lands should be involved in this litigation, this amendment ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VOORHEES in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin in reference to this amendment. Suppose the amendment be adopted, suppose the Supreme Court passes on the question now before it between the railroad companies, what would be the status of the lands?

Mr. SPOONER. As I stated to the Senate a moment ago in answer to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, the act of the Legislature of Iowa under which certain lands have been conveyed by the governor of Iowa back to the United States excepts the lands in Dickinson and O'Brien Counties, where the lands in question are. The title to these lands is in the State of Iowa. The State of Iowa has not conveyed them to the company pending the determination of this litigation. This litigation will end in a few days. If the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide as the circuit court decided and as Mr. Justice Miller—than whom there is no greater judge living—decided, that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company had earned, as it undoubtedly had, one-half of these lands, there is no reason to suppose that the State of Iowa will hesitate to convey the lands to that company. If this bill passes without the amendment the district attorney of the United States must, notwithstanding the decision, embrace these lands in this litigation.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask one question of the Senator from Iowa. I ask whether the lands he proposes by his amendment to except out of the provisions of this bill are lands which the circuit court of the United States has decided upon?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; they are lands which the circuit court of the United States has decreed, by specific sections, to have been earned by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company by the construction of its road, within the time, to the intersection point.

Mr. CONGER. And the suit in which that decision has been rendered has been appealed to the Supreme Court?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir; and will be argued next Monday.

Mr. CONGER. The object of the amendment is that it shall be undisturbed by this act of Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. The object is that whatever lands the Supreme Court shall decide were earned by the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Company shall not be drawn into this litigation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is somewhat at fault with reference to his statement concerning the legislation of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa. The act by which the State resumed these lands was passed in 1882, and is not the act of 1884 to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not refer to the act of 1882; I referred to the act of 1884.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Under which it is said the governor of Iowa has reconveyed to the United States certain lands. I referred to that act for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the act itself excepts from his authority to convey back to the United States the lands in Dickinson and O'Brien Counties.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not understand that a conveyance has been made. The first section of the act of 1882 provides:

That all lands, and all rights to lands granted or intended to be granted to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company by said acts of Congress, and of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, which have not been earned by said railroad company by a compliance with the conditions of said grant, be, and the same are hereby, absolutely and entirely resumed by the State of Iowa, and that the same be, and are, absolutely vested in said State as if the same had never been granted to said railroad company.

That is the complete resumption under the act of 1882. The act of 1884 was one which provided in the second section thereof that—

The governor of the State of Iowa is hereby authorized and directed to certify to the Secretary of the Interior all lands which have heretofore been patented to the State to aid in the construction of said railroad, and which have not been patented by the State to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and the list of land so certified by the governor shall be presumed to be the lands relinquished and conveyed by section 1 of this act: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to apply to lands situated in the counties of Dickinson and O'Brien.

But this has no reference whatever to the act of resumption by the State. The State resumed the entire body of unearned lands, and the controversy involved grows out in part of the change of line by the company in its construction from that of the definitely located line which it filed in the Department.

The Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, has said that this is a bill for peace; and it is. If the bill shall pass without this amendment we shall have an opportunity to have peace established. If it shall pass with this amendment, then hereafter, after all has been settled that can be settled under the bill with the amendment, after all that shall have been accomplished, Congress will again be applied to for remedy.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator at some time convenient to him a question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will hear it now.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose this amendment be not passed, will it not be the duty of the district attorney under the bill, if it becomes a law, to make parties to the suit persons whose title to their land will have been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the pending suit? And, if that be true, will not those persons who have once sustained their title in the highest court of the country be at the risk of having a judgment go against them, exposed to that possibility, or be obliged to again employ counsel and defend themselves anew?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why, Mr. President, if the case to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers as the one in which these parties may receive a decree establishing their rights, involved all the parties, who may be such, to the record, under the operation of this bill if it shall pass, then I would answer him that for such parties to appear and plead that decree would be a complete answer. But there is no such case pending. The United States is not a party in the pending suit.

Mr. HOAR. I do not quite get the answer of the Senator from Iowa. My inquiry is whether it will not be the duty of the district attorney under this bill, if it remains unchanged, to make parties to the proposed suit persons whose title is in controversy in the pending case in the Supreme Court of the United States, and whether therefore, even if their title is affirmed so far as that case goes between the litigants there, they will not still be compelled to employ counsel and to attend the new case perhaps to the Supreme Court of the United States in order to defend their title over again?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Undoubtedly, if the district attorney should make them parties.

Mr. HOAR. Is he not bound to make them such?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. To this suit they would have to do just what any other parties in a suit would do, take care of their own interests, as all parties do take care of their interests in lawsuits; but there is no determination complete relative to the controversy concerning these lands except by the passage of this bill without the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is there any doubt which can arise about the title to these lands, except such as will arise out of the question of performance or non-performance of the conditions of the act by which these lands were granted to the State of Iowa for the purpose of constructing the McGregor road? And if that be so, are not all the parties in interest to that question embraced in the action now pending in the Supreme Court upon an appeal from the decision of the circuit court in Iowa?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota most emphatically in the negative.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand the governor of the State of Iowa is a party to that action, and both railroad companies are parties to that action. Under the act of Congress and in the present condition of the case all questions must arise out of that land grant. No person can have any interest in the lands except under that act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Senator is mistaken again, for the reason that the act making the grant specially provides that these lands, in case of failure of the company and State to complete the railroads according to the terms of the grant, shall revert to the United States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. But there is no question of failure, because there is a complete performance of the construction of the McGregor road between both termini.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The failure of one involves the overlapping limits as concerning both.

Mr. SPOONER. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to state to the Senate as a proposition of law that under this land-grant act, if one company built its whole road within the time limited, 227 miles, and the other company failed to construct a few miles of its road, thereby the company which has complied forfeits any of its rights?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; I hope the Senator does not so understand me; but I can make him a statement which I hope he will understand; and that is to say that although the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company has constructed its road to Sheldon, the question involved in the change of the line of definite location and the failure of the Sioux City and Saint Paul company to construct its line does concern the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company so far as the overlapping limits within the grant may be concerned; for if it is to be adjusted on the constructed line then there is one quantity, if it is to be adjusted on the line of definite location then there is another quantity.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa, in justice to myself, that I comprehend the statement which he has just made; but I desire to say to him, in justice to myself, that I understand, as a matter of law, there is no earthly foundation for that statement. Every land grant that ever has been made by the Congress of the United States has been adjusted, as I stated to the Senate yesterday, not upon the line of construction but upon the line of location, and the Supreme Court has decided such to be the law. Twenty years ago the Supreme Court of the United States decided in a case which I had the honor to argue there, that the rights of the State and the company in the land grant were fixed by the filing in the Department of the map of definite location. That map was filed by this company, and the grant and its limits became definite and fixed. The deflection, as I showed to the Senate yesterday, in the line of construction, while it might under some circumstances raise a question as to whether the company had not abandoned its rights under the land grant, does not change and never has been considered as changing in the slightest degree the limits of the grant—either the primary or the indemnity limits—so that the change in the constructed road, which in this particular case was only 3 miles, and it was sanctioned by the Department. has nothing whatever to do with the question of adjustment.

Now, Mr. President, a word more, and I shall trouble the Senate no more upon this amendment. I thank the Senator from Iowa for calling my attention to the act of 1882, and for stating to the Senate that the Senator from Kansas was mistaken in saying that the governor of Iowa had executed any conveyance of these lands back to the United States. The State of Iowa never has resumed or undertaken to resume the lands in this overlapping limit which it had granted to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company. The State of Iowa conferred upon the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company in 1878 the grant from McGregor to the intersection point, expressly including the lands to which it might be entitled in this overlapping limit. The intention of the Legislature was manifestly to give to that company, as it ought to give to that company, its proportion of the lands in this conflict.

I stated to the Senate that the State of Iowa had had no controversy with the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company; that its controversy has been entirely with the Sioux City and Saint Paul company, which alone it could claim was in default, and the act of 1882 proves it. Will the Senate bear with me one moment while I call attention to the preamble of the act?

Whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 3, A. D. 1866, so much of the lands, interests, rights, powers, and privileges as were or might be conferred, in pursuance of said acts of Congress, to aid in the construction of the aforesaid road—

That is, the Saint Paul and Sioux City road, not the Milwaukee and Saint Paul road—were disposed of, granted, and conferred—

Not upon the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company, but—upon the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; and

Whereas said act of Congress further provides that if the road accepting said grant is not completed within ten years from its acceptance thereof, the lands thereby granted and not patented should revert to the State of Iowa for the purpose of securing the completion of said road; and

Whereas said Sioux City and Saint Paul company—

Not the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company—

Whereas said Sioux City and Saint Paul company duly accepted said grant on the 20th day of September, A. D. 1866, but has failed to complete or cause to be completed any road on the line adopted therefor, from Sioux City to Le Mars—

This 24 miles—

in said State of Iowa, or any road in lieu thereof:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That all lands, and all rights to lands granted or intended to be granted—

Not to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company, which had completed its road through to Sheldon—and all rights to lands granted or intended to be granted to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company—

Including its one-half in the overlap, are resumed to the State of Iowa, leaving in the State of Iowa beyond any possible question the lands in the overlap which it had conferred on the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company for completing its road from McGregor to the intersection point. So, then, a part of these lands would be embraced, without my amendment, in the litigation proposed by this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The complete answer to the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin is this, that all of the lands in controversy, both as respects the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands and his amendment, were conveyed by the United States to the State of Iowa for the benefit of the Sioux City and Saint Paul company.

Mr. SPOONER. But has not the court decided that that conveyance could not change the trust created by the act of Congress; that a part of these lands, although patented by the Secretary of the Interior to Iowa for the benefit of the one company, inured to the benefit of the other?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is a case in which, as I have already said, one of the very important parties does not appear in the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to section 2:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to embrace or involve in the litigation to be initiated and carried on under the provisions hereof any lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide, in the cause now in said court pending on appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, in which the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company is appellant and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, John H. Gear (governor), and others are respondents, to have been earned by the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company by the construction of the portion of the land-grant railway from McGregor, Iowa, to a point of connection with the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad at Sheldon, in O'Brien County, Iowa.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on this question.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], but understanding that he would vote for the amendment if present, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Beck,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Butler,	Gray,	Miller,	Spooner,
Chace,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Stanford,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Palmer,	Voorhees.
Conger,	Hoar,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Cullom,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,
Eustis,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Evarts,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

NAYS—13.

Allison,	George,	Pugh,	Wilson of Iowa.
Berry,	Hawley,	Teller,
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Plumb,	Walthall,

ABSENT—29.

Blackburn,	Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Fair,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Hale,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Vest.
Cameron,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Morgan,
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer the following amendment, to follow the amendment just adopted by the Senate:

Nor any lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide in said cause to have been earned by the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company.

I think the Senate understands the facts here very fully from the discussion which has just taken place. The lands embraced in this action are located midway upon the Saint Paul and Sioux City road, as it has been constructed under the act of Congress. These lands lie in place along the constructed road of the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company. There is no difference whatever between the question presented in the amendment just adopted and in this, except that the Sioux City company did not complete its road entirely to the terminus on the Missouri River at Sioux City, but it has constructed through these lands, and in 10-mile sections the lands have been earned by the company under the act of Congress, and these are part of the lands in place along the road. Fifty miles of the road have been actually built in sections, and these are part of the lands which have been earned by the construction of that road, and cannot be taken from this company, because the Supreme Court has settled that question beyond all doubt; and the question as to the division of the lands in the overlapping limits between these companies is pending in the action referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin. The supreme court there will determine the right of the Sioux City and Saint Paul road to the moiety of their lands remaining after the portion disposed of by the amendment just adopted. I think the Senate understands the question very fully, and it is not necessary for me perhaps to discuss it further.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask of him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. If I understand the proposition aright, if the 6½ miles that have been built had been 10, in the natural process the land would have been allotted to this road; and the only doubt about it was that under the law the lands were to be given to the road on the completion of each 10 miles.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. But as there is an overlapping between the two roads, and this company only built 6½ miles——

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; 56½ miles of the road have been built. For 50 miles the company earned the lands in five 10-mile sections. For the rest of the road the company has received no lands, and the amendment I offered at the opening of the discussion was for the purpose of permitting the company to have lands for the 6½ miles constructed for which lands have not been allowed.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I understood. If there had been 10 miles constructed, there would have been no question, as I understand.

Mr. MCMILLAN. None whatever.

Mr. CONGER. This is to give land for what was actually constructed, although not 10 miles?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes; this is right on the road in place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know but that it is the purpose of the Senate to so amend this bill that it shall accomplish no object whatever except that of keeping this matter before Congress until the end of time. This amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is designed for that purpose, and will undoubtedly aid in accomplishing it. This bill refers to lands which have been patented to the State of Iowa and which the State of Iowa, feeling that the railroad company had not earned, has reconveyed to the United States. The title in these lands is in the General Government to-day.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to call his attention to a matter in regard to that statement? These lands are in the counties which are excepted from the lands to be conveyed by the State of Iowa, and they are in the State of Iowa in trust for this company.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator knows as well as he knows anything that that company will never get a single acre of these lands unless it gets them as the result of some judicial decision, or unless it succeeds, as it undoubtedly hopes to do, in wearing everybody out, and so at the end of a long and hopeless struggle getting something to which it is not by the law entitled.

The purpose of the Senator in this matter is very plain, of course. Here is a fact which I will venture to restate again to the Senate: There are about 85,000 acres of these lands which were not earned in accordance with the terms of the granting act, and I call attention to the fact that the granting act, as shown by the copy which is contained in the report, was not a grant of so many acres per mile, but of so many acres per section of 10 miles. The railroad company did not complete the railroad, and the last part of its construction was not the construction of a section of 10 miles. The State of Iowa, therefore, refused to transfer the lands to the railroad company, and they remain in that condition to-day; and the Legislature of the State of Iowa, for the purpose of preventing the governor from even assuming to do that, by an act duly passed and approved, said what amounted substantially to a direction to him not to do it; and the Interior Department, acting upon that question, as it had a right to do, decided that these lands were not the property of the railroad company, but were lands which the Government ought to resume for the purpose of opening them to settlement. On that statement settlers have gone upon them.

Now, we propose simply to send this question to the courts to ascertain whether these parties are entitled to the lands or not, the Government asserting its reversionary interest in them for the purpose of laying the foundation for the suit, and the courts to decide all the interests there are in controversy. The Senate proposes to except first this and then the other. Why should we not take out all of them and be done with it? The decision of the case pending in the Supreme Court will not determine the question as between the Government and the railroad company at all. The railroad company can not set up in that suit any rights against the Government, and the Government can not set up any rights against the railroad company. The Government is not there at all. Therefore it will decide no fact that is necessary for the purpose of determining what is the essence of this controversy, to wit, whether this railroad company has earned the land or not. Yet it is proposed affirmatively here to give to it certain lands which have become a subject of litigation between this railroad company and another railroad company, to which litigation the Government is not a party, and in which, of course, it can set up no right.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas is certainly mistaken in the presentation he has made of the granting act in this instance. The lands were granted to the State of Iowa for a certain number of sections per mile of road. That was the granting clause. A subsequent portion of the act prescribed that the State should certify these lands to the company whenever they completed 10 miles of their road, and for each 10 miles completed the Government was to convey the lands. It was the mode of the execution of the trust that was limited to the 10-mile sections, although that does not, I think, make any very great difference in the principle here. This company proceeded to construct 56 miles of road. For each 10-mile section in 50 miles they have earned the quantity of land prescribed by the act of Congress. These lands were patented to the State of Iowa in trust for this purpose in connection with other trusts that they were to execute. They have not conveyed the lands in these two counties because of the conflict between these two railroad companies, a dispute having arisen between them as to the lands which should be conveyed. In resuming the lands and directing them to be reconveyed to the United States the State of Iowa has excepted the lands in the two counties, Dickinson and O'Brien, which lie at the middle of the road as constructed by the Sioux City company, at the junction of it and the Milwaukee and Saint Paul road.

There can be no doubt about their having the lands upon the five 10-mile sections; most of them have been certified to the company; these have been reserved; and the parties interested in this matter are all involved in the suit pending in the Supreme Court, the State of Iowa represented by the governor of the State, and the two railroad companies. That suit is to determine, of course, the lands which are due to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company, and they are merely to take from the lands which have been patented to the Sioux City road by the decree of the court. So the court must pass upon the title of the Sioux City road to the entire grant before it can determine the right of the Milwaukee and Saint Paul company to their portion of it.

Now, in a case of this kind where the company have gone on and constructed their road far beyond these lands, why throw them into litigation again when they are passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States and are merely taking from the Saint Paul and Sioux City company a portion of that to which they are entitled by reason of the construction of their road?

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator mean to say that in the suit now pending in the Supreme Court there will be any issue to be decided by the court as between the Government and this railroad company?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The court must pass upon the grant to the Saint Paul and Sioux City road. These lands are in the Saint Paul and Sioux City grant.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator mean to say that the court can pass upon the question whether this road was built within the proper time or not?

Mr. MCMILLAN. As between these companies and the State of Iowa they must of course determine the right to these lands.

Mr. PLUMB. Not as between the companies and the General Government.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The General Government is not a party except as the act of Congress is involved which has been passed by the General Government; and there can be no doubt about the whole question being involved. This does not involve any lands to which this company are not entitled, but they are on the same footing exactly as the other company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called). My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). In the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] I am paired with him and do not vote. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I decline to vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. On the last roll-call I voted under a misapprehension. On this I am at liberty to vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] having returned, I desire to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Conger,	McMillan,	Sabin,	Stanford.
Dolph,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Hoar,	Palmer,	Sherman,

NAYS—29.

Allison,	Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Berry,	Eustis,	Jackson,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vance,
Butler,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chace,	Hampton,	Manderson,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Mitchell of Oreg.,
Coke,	Hawley,	Plumb,

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Fair,	Maxey,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Frye,	Miller,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	George,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,
Brown,	Gray,	Morgan,	Spooner,

Cameron,	Harrison,	Payne,	Vest,
Cullom,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting after the word "entry," in section 5, line 5, the following words:

Provided, That if the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company have constructed their road for any portion of a section of 10 miles, and have refrained for good reasons from constructing the same for the remainder of such section, and that such refraining from constructing the same has been for the public advantage, he may cause patents to be issued to said road for such proportion of the lands which would have been earned by the completion of said 10 miles as the amount of road already built bears to said 10 miles.

I understand that the point in the bill which this amendment affects is exactly this: The United States granted to the State of Iowa some public lands for the purpose of constructing railroads within its borders. It authorized the governor of that State, when a section of 10 miles was completed, to issue a patent for a certain quantity of land. The United States provided for two railroads in that arrangement. It turned out that one of the railroad companies came down and built its railroad over lands embraced within the termini of the other. The Sioux City and Saint Paul company were entitled to go on and build their road in the same neighborhood, and thereby compel the United States under the law to give two land grants for those 10 miles instead of one—one to each company. Thinking that that was not desirable for the public or desirable for them, they stopped and brought their road to a termination at the end of six miles and a fraction, leaving the remainder of the 10-mile section unfinished. Then they proceeded to convey their property to a trustee in favor of some capitalists, who loaned at 7 per cent., if I am not mistaken, paying out the entire amount of the money, receiving their bonds secured by this mortgage, on which bonds they have received neither principal nor interest for some years.

It seems to me that, if that is true, it is just that the United States should let this company have the lands for the six-tenths that it built, and not set up a mere technical answer that they were not to have any lands unless the 10-mile section was completed. And it is not an answer to that proposition to attack railroads, or to say that other railroads in times past have done all sorts of wrong things. It seems to me that the Senate is capable of taking the railroads of this country and the citizens of this country and all other public interests alike and of dealing out to them absolute justice, without fear or favor.

This bill will take away from the United States the possibility of doing what it thinks just in regard to these bondholders, because it provides that the United States shall resume these lands unless the legal title has been parted with, and then, some of them being worth considerably more than a dollar and a quarter an acre, they shall be sold out to certain settlers at the original pre-emption price.

The amendment provides that if the President of the United States shall be satisfied on inquiry that this road refrained from completing that section of 10 miles for good reasons, and, further, that that refusal was a benefit to the public, so that the road did not do it for its own advantage, but the United States has been the gainer by it, he shall be authorized in that case to issue a patent for so much of the lands as the proportion of road actually built bears to a section of 10 miles. It seems to me that this is as absolutely fair and just a proposition as can be put into words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. PLUMB. I think one tribunal to settle this question is enough; but of course the effect of this amendment is to practically render nugatory all the remainder of the bill, because with the President by it is deposited the entire jurisdiction after all. The controversy in this bill is in regard to lands which it is claimed belong to a fractional section of the road. There is something very remarkable in the determination of this company never to submit its rights to the adjudication of a court. Why all at once this sudden confidence in the President of the United States? Why this distrust of the courts of the United States? It is simply for the purpose of enabling somebody to get up a juggle whereby this railroad company will have something which the law did not entitle it to have. Why does not the Senator from Massachusetts come out in a manly way and propose to make these people a new grant, and be done with it? We know all the facts that the President can ever find out. They have all been stated here by Senators who are familiar with them, who are in combination and concert with the parties in interest and with this railroad company.

The fact is that they built to Le Mars not to subserve any public interest whatever. I have heard a good deal of the gushing philanthropy of this railroad company lately. It is a new idea to me that railroad companies ever did anything pro bono publico. When they started their line on the south boundary of the State of Minnesota they had more than 50 miles within which to locate the point of beginning. They could have located it in such a way as to have gone 30 miles west of Le Mars, and gone in a straight line clear down to Sioux City. The policy of Congress was to have a line built all the way. Instead of that they knowingly built up against a railroad which was built before ever they started, and stopped there, and then made a contract with that railroad company that in case they would let them run their through trains over its line they would not do an item of local business between Le Mars and Sioux City, thus depriving all the people of that section of country of the local benefit of the railroad.

There never has been a more flagrant violation of public right, a more complete contempt for the public, than is exhibited by the claim of this railroad company to these lands, and it is an afterthought. For more than ten years after they completed their railroad they never set up a single claim to these lands. It was not until the public was aroused on the subject, until the fact that the lands lying there idle became the subject of inquiry among people who would like to be settlers, that the railroad company came in and set up any claim to them, and then they sought to do it by indirection, just as they are seeking here in every way to impede the settlement of this question by the courts in order that their legal rights may be determined as they should be and as the rights of others are determined.

Who ever heard of submitting a question of this kind to the President of the United States? Did Congress ever before lack the courage to make a railroad grant if it wanted to? Why say to the President, "If you want to you may take 85,000 acres of land out of the public domain and endow a railroad company with it?" No, sir; if there is to be a new grant made, if we are to endow this railroad company with new lands to which they are not entitled, let us have the manliness to come out and say so, as other statutes have said so, and not get behind the skirts of the President of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this company was constrained to build its road from one terminus to another, and it started and went as nearly by a straight line from the terminus of beginning to the terminus of completion as you can put down on a map. There is scarcely a divergence from a straight line on the map. When it got to its last 10 miles it found another chartered road which had come around with a long curve, and came in there within its chartered limits and gone to the very territory which the continuance of this straight line would have brought this straight road into, and it was a land-grant road also; and the two roads would have come within 4 or 5 miles of each other. What then did this company do? If it had gone on and completed its road the Government would have had to pay out for the entire section of 10 miles two sets of land grants; and thereupon it stopped, it made its terminus at the line of the other road and saved just that amount to the United States.

The Senator from Kansas talks about our making a new land grant and not going to the courts. If you go to the courts, of course the technical legal answer is open to the Government; that is, you are not to have any land except on a certificate that a section of 10 miles was completed, and you have only built 6. This amendment proposes to waive that technicality, that injustice, that wrong, and to say that if the President of the United States on investigation finds these two things to be true: first, that this road stopped for a good reason; second, that it conferred an advantage on the public by so doing, he shall have the power to issue to it patents for its lands for the proportionate part.

Now, I would like to ask any Senator within the sound of my voice what there is unmanly, or retreating behind anybody's skirts, or indirect in making that proposition to the Senate? It is a clear and straightforward proposition. Everybody who votes against it knows what he is voting against, and everybody who votes for it knows what he is voting for.

The precise thing which I say ought to be done and claim ought to be done is, that if this railroad did not complete its full 10 miles because another land-grant railroad had taken up a part of its territory, and that was a benefit to the public, instead of Congress requiring it to go on and complete the section it would, if the case arose at the passage of the first law of Congress, of course have said "no;" and I propose that under these circumstances the President is to waive the technicality.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts misstates the facts entirely, undoubtedly unconsciously. In the first place, when this company commenced to build its road under this land grant every mile of the road built by the other company was already constructed and had been several years before. So when it commenced its construction upon the line which it ultimately adopted it knew just exactly where it would lead; that is, to this constructed line.

Mr. HOAR. A straight line.

Mr. PLUMB. It was not a straight line, except by reason of the fact that they elected to take a point of beginning which made it a straight line, for they had more than 50 miles of leeway in which to start the road.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will let me alone——

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is important that the Senator should get the facts correctly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not.

The act of Congress said that they should commence on "the south line of the State of Minnesota at such point as the said State of Iowa may select, between the Big Sioux and the west fork of the Des Moines River," a space of more than 50 miles, and the State of Iowa was authorized by the act to build from any point it chose within that limit. When the company commenced their construction in the first place for the purpose of getting the withdrawal of lands they staked out the line which they filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, which averages more than 6 miles west of the line on which they built, but subsequently coming to an arrangement with the other railway company which had already built its line they changed that line and built 6 miles west and came down and effected the junction, and then, as I said, in order to make use of that for their own purposes, in order to get rid of building 25 miles of railroad because there were not lands enough remaining to give them one hundred sections for every mile down to Sioux City, they did not complete it because they were not going to get the profit. There is the milk in that cocoanut. So for the purpose of enabling them to stop construction they made a contract with this other railroad that if they would let them join at Le Mars they would do no local business between those two points, and thus they cut the people of that section of country out of the benefit of competition.

Now what is the use of the Senator from Massachusetts leaving this question to the President? He has decided it himself. He says it was unjust; he says they did this thing for a great public purpose and they saved the Government some of the land, and they accomplished the purpose Congress had in view, and if Congress had known beforehand the thing would have been done they would have authorized it to be done. Then why does he want to leave it to the President when he has decided it already? Why does he not have the manliness to come out and say, "I will give these parties the lands notwithstanding they have not complied with the law?" It is a new grant. That is all there is about it. It is true as the Senator from Massachusetts says; they technically did not comply with the grant; in other words, they did not comply with the law under which alone they could get the grant, and he advises us now to make them a grant and put them in as good a condition as they would have been if they had complied with the law.

I think that this power of waiving errors, or this permission to waive errors and what are called technicalities, ought not to be invoked in favor of a railroad company least of all other corporations or all other persons, natural or artificial. They have got in their employ the best lawyers in the land. They constantly keep in their employ men of that kind. They went down there to Le Mars under legal advice, undoubtedly. They took their chances, and I have no doubt that same legal advice was to the effect that they were not entitled to these lands because they never set up any claim to them for more than ten years later. They did not even mortgage them, and that is a very considerable circumstance, because I never knew of a railroad company before that did not mortgage not only all that it had but all its expectations near and remote. It did not even mortgage these lands. It knew it had no right to them, but it has been prompted by somebody to come here, and it has found Senators like the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Massachusetts, who, of course with proper motives, are now determined that these lands shall be taken from the public domain by legislation and given to a railroad company which did not earn them and has no more right to them than a railroad company in the State of Kansas has.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I endeavored to interrupt the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of getting the truth to the Senate. I am aware that the Senator from Kansas has no other desire in advocating this bill than to do an act of public justice, and in doing that it is not his desire to mislead the Senate. As the chairman of one of the great committees of the Senate, he does not wish to present anything here that is not true in regard to these matters. He does not wish to mislead the Senate. But suppose that this company has done anything which it has not done, or that it has violated its duty in any way, yet the presentation of the case as the Senator has made it would do great and violent injustice in this instance.

He said that these lands were granted to the State of Iowa for the construction of a road from the northern line of Iowa, and that the company had fifty miles of a margin in which it could locate its point of commencement; and on the face of the law, on the letter of the law it had, but the object of the law, the purpose of it when applied to existing circumstances, was very plain and beyond doubt, because a railroad had been constructed to the northern line of Iowa from Saint Paul which gave direct connection from this region not only with Saint Paul but clear to Lake Superior, and brought them directly to the great water way to the East, which enabled these farmers to get their grain to market and conferred upon them the purpose of competing for the market with all the great trunk lines of railroad crossing this continent. That was the purpose of getting them to the water channel there, and it was to extend that connection to the Missouri River that this grant was made. The connection had already been made to the northern line of Iowa at a particular point where the road struck that line, and this grant was intended to continue the road on down southwest and afford those people a market, and the same company which had built the road from Saint Paul southwest to the Iowa line built this Sioux City and Saint Paul road farther southwest into this agricultural region, and gave them a market for their grain.

So the point at which they were to commence on the northern line of Iowa was absolutely fixed; and if this company had commenced to build at any other place it would have been a violation of their duty and defeated the purpose of the people of Iowa and of the act of Congress in making a grant of land for the purpose in view.

Here is the line of the road, the most direct line that could have been constructed from the head of Lake Superior down to the town of Le Mars, where this road stopped, and it stopped why? It stopped at Le Mars only because it found constructed from that point farther southwest a railroad under the land grant of the United States for 24 miles on the direct line which this road would have pursued had it been extended.

Talk about bad faith or interfering with communities! These people by the construction of this road have had opened to them competition with all the great lines of transportation by railroad across the continent. That is what they were seeking. They were looking to the great Northern lakes, and this line goes from the Missouri River up to Lake Superior and is a part of the great line connecting with the Union Pacific Railroad.

No, Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Kansas presents this case in a light which is deceptive. You can not get at the truth by it. Of course I would not intend to intimate anything else than that it was unintentional. The point was fixed by the construction of the road, and that enabled them to go on and build it, and having terminated the road at the town of Le Mars they built up the town, they gave a market to the farming community around there, and bestowed upon them advantages which they will continue to reap as long as the agricultual settlements continue there.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to say, in reply to the statement of the Senator from Minnesota with respect to the point of commencement on the southern line of the State of Minnesota that the determination of that place of commencement was entirely within the hands of this company, because this was but a part of the company that constructed down through Minnesota to the southern line of that State.

Mr. MCMILLAN. So as to strike the northern line of Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Exactly; so that the two companies, one in Minnesota and one in Iowa, forming practically one, had the whole thing in their own hands, and they had the play of 50 miles within which to determine where they would start the line.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Not at that time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. At that time.

Now, I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate in repeating what has been said; but I do wish to enforce one consideration upon the minds of Senators, and that is this: When the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Minnesota make an appeal here on the ground of the good faith of this company in the discharge of its duty they are planting themselves on a basis that can not stand. The law fixed the duty of the company, and that was to build a road from Sioux City to the south line of the State of Minnesota. Instead of that they commenced at the south line of the State of Minnesota and built south to the town of Le Mars; and when they got there they did not make an intersection with the other road embraced within the act of 1864. They there found another company that had its land grant on to Sioux City, had constructed its road, and by obtaining its land thereby consumed the greater part of the land between there and Sioux City.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to call his attention to a statement there?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Illinois Central had an act passed in 1864 by which it was permitted to change its line from some point in the State of Iowa, some town there, and instead of running due west ran northwest out of its course to Le Mars and then southwest to Sioux City; but while it was permitted to change its line its land grant was not changed, and it took its grant away down south of that along the original line of survey.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Notwithstanding that fact, the land grant made to the Illinois Central and to the Milwaukee and Saint Paul and to this company overlapped each other.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That would not have interfered with this company getting the land.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But it does interfere, because overlapping the grant the lands within the overlapping limits would be divided up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will pause. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is entitled to the floor on the pending resolutions.

Mr. PLUMB. I would not, of course, interfere with the convenience of the Senator from West Virginia, but I am sure that we can dispose of this matter in a few moments if he will yield.

Mr. KENNA. I have no objection to yielding for a very few moments, but I wish to dispose of the matter I have in hand to-day, and I do not want to be too late in the evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside informally the pending business with a view to continuing the consideration of the bill which has been before the Senate?

Mr. KENNA. I can not consent to that arrangement except with a limit as to time.

Mr. PLUMB. I will yield to the Senator from West Virginia at any moment he shall see fit to demand the floor.

Mr. KENNA. How long does the Senator suppose it will take to finish the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not suppose it will take more than ten minutes.

Mr. KENNA. I shall very cheerfully wait ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the consideration of the pending bill will be proceeded with. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was rejected—ayes 8, noes not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for a separate vote on the last amendment I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been defeated, the Senator will have to renew it in the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall renew it when the question is disposed of on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to my friend from Kansas that it is not quite fair to let the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] be lost in his absence. He is away under the belief that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business would come up. I shall not press my amendment any further.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall not ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, though of course, if the Senator from Iowa desires a separate vote, it is his right to demand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As no separate vote is demanded on concurring in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, the Chair will again put the question on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I now renew the last amendment I offered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2, as amended, the following words:

Nor any lands which the Supreme Court of the United States shall decide in said cause to have been earned by the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer this amendment because I think there is no difference in the principle between the provisions of this amendment and the amendment which was adopted in Committee of the Whole and concurred in by the Senate, offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The companies are in the same suit. The lands are precisely in the same situation, with one single exception as to the terminus of this road.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings;

A bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md.;

A bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue, and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.; and

A bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will now be proceeded with.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President, I was impressed, as I have no doubt others were, by the anomalous conditions which characterized the proceedings of this body on the 9th day of this month. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who, whether it be so in fact or not, is recognized throughout this country as the father of this movement of obstruction to legitimate executive power, had occupied the floor for two or three hours. He had done so with the capacities which we all know him to possess. He had made, it is to be presumed, as the country expected that he would make, all that could be made of the issues involved in this controversy. He had argued with elaboration and with great skill issues of his own creation, and had come to confront the membership on this floor as he had come to confront the American people with a proposition very candidly and frankly stated in the early part of his speech. I shall not go in detail into the report that lies on your table, nor shall I at this moment undertake to discuss the resolutions which accompany it; but shall prefer for my own convenience, and I trust for the equal convenience of those who may hear me, to treat the issue as presented by the Senator himself.

Is this body as a part and parcel of the legislative branch of this Government entitled to call upon the executive department in any one of its forms or divisions or subdivisions and to receive in turn such documents and papers as come within the definition of public and official papers as laid down by the Senator from Vermont? That as a primary proposition is the issue which is involved here to-day. Let us see what the definition of such papers is as prescribed by the author of this entire movement. The Senator from Vermont said:

What is an official paper, sir? It is not material to this discussion because the Senate has not called for anything else. What is an official paper? Suppose a letter were addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, as some are every day, as you know, sir, and came to your office as President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, proceeding to state that such a public measure was useful or hurtful; would that be a private paper or a public paper, a private paper or an official paper? I take it there would be but one answer to that question.

I am obliged to state that in my conception every Senator on this floor took it at the same time that there could be but one answer to that question. But to my surprise, and I do not doubt to the surprise of all, the Senator from Vermont proceeded:

You would hardly think it within the fitness of things, I take it, that you could carry it to your house, or put it into your pocket, or put it into your fireplace and destroy it. It is addressed to you in your official character, and that is what gives character to a paper of whatever kind it is, whether official or whether private. It is true there may be official papers that are marked confidential, but they are not the less official papers.

Now I take it that out of all the papers which exist in the Department of Justice—and the report of the Attorney-General admits that there they are—there is not one of them on this subject or on any other subject that is not addressed either to the Chief Executive of the United States in his character as such, or to some head of a Department, or some officer of the Department in his character as such, and that is why they are in the Department of Justice or in any other Department. That is what gives them their character.

Mr. President, the suspension of an officer is said by the minority of the committee to be an act solely within the exclusive discretion of the President of the United States. So say the majority of the committee. But is not the suspension of a public officer an official act? The statute says it is; the President says it is. When under his seal and signature and the certificate of the Secretary of State, the attesting witness of the authenticity of the document, he suspends an officer, he does it officially. Of course, he has no right to do it privately. It is the President, and not the man, that suspends the officer, and it is therefore an official act. Therefore, every paper which is addressed to the officer exercising that function, in his character as the officer exercising that function, and upon that topic, must be an official paper. No matter how vile it may be, no matter how false it may be, no matter how little influence it may produce upon the mind of the officer who has to act upon it, it is not the less an official paper.

In my judgment, what appears on the face of the papers here is not the real object of this controversy, but primarily the Senator from Vermont in that definition of what constitutes an official paper has defined for himself and for the Senate and for the country the issue upon which we are contending. If addressed to you, sir, in your character and capacity as President pro tempore of the Senate, that and that alone makes it an official paper to the use of which every Department and functionary of this great Government is entitled, It may come from a Pottawatomie Indian, signed by him in his original dialect, involving the remote contingency of the scalping of the officers and members of this Senate, and yet, according to that definition, it is an official paper.

The Senator from Vermont proceeded to demonstrate, assuming his theories to be correct, that the Senate of which he is a member has a right to go into every Department of this Government, to go to the White House and to the Treasury, to the War Department and to the State Department, to the Post-Office Department and everywhere, whether acting in executive session or in open session, ransacking the archives of those Departments of the Government and wringing from them papers coming within the definition which I have read. Yet the very mockery of this situation seemed by some providential interposition to exhibit itself within a few moments after he had concluded. No sooner had the honorable Senator taken his seat than as is customary in this body some Senator moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and the bells which are arranged here for the convenience of members of this honorable Senate began to tingle throughout this end of the Capitol.

A body of gentlemen composing a part of this co-ordinate branch of the Government, having listened to the argument which undertook to show that all mankind shall have no secret from us, was admonished by the clanging of those bells that the time had come when the Senate would put on its robes of royal purple and the rest of mankind must go. Five thousand brave men and fair women were expelled from your galleries. The eyes of the American press were closed there. The doors rattled, the sentinels took their posts, and as a fitting testimonial, at the conclusion of the speech of the honorable Senator from Vermont, the Senate was resolved into the darkness of its ancient secrecy. As the files marched out and the officers assumed their posts as guards of the great privileges asserted here for the Senate and denied everywhere else, the thought came to my mind how abundantly practices may ingraft themselves upon the human composition and how little perhaps members of this body in the whole of the consideration of this important subject had given reflection to the fact that for a hundred years and more this and this alone has been the star chamber of the American Republic.

Sir, the Senator from Vermont would deny privacy or confidence to every paper in any Department of the Government. Let us see where his doctrine would lead. Suppose that some respectable citizen of this Government to-day, or some vile man profiting by the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, should choose to address a letter to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States in which he declared that the question involved in this debate is a purely moot question; that nobody supporting it has any faith in it; that it is only the third or the fourth stage of the change of position and status occupied by those who advance it since the beginning of this controversy, and urging the President pro tempore of the body to advocate it on the theory that it may prove to be a profitable make-shift in order to maintain in their present positions a hundred thousand Republican office-holders and to prostitute to party ends the present executive department of this Government. That might be vile, it might come from a vile source, and yet under the declaration and definition of this issue as laid down by the Senator from Vermont that would be an official paper, that would be a public paper by the very fact of its being addressed to the presiding officer of this body in his official capacity, and that paper would be subject to any uses to which we chose to subject it.

Suppose some vile man, and of course he would have been a vile man to do it, should have addressed the presiding officer of this body some weeks ago a letter in which he stated, "You are behind the times; the Senator from Vermont is moving in advance of you in this matter. It is a popular issue among our people. It may result in the maintenance of a large number of Republicans in responsible and lucrative positions. Do not allow him to take the advance. Do not let that Senator take the initiatory. Look to the approaching national convention of 1888. Look to your laurels. Take the floor yourself when the gentleman is not in. Take the floor yourself. The Senator from Vermont has not yet prepared his report; but take the floor yourself. This issue must be met. There is nothing pending in the Senate upon which to take the floor, unless it be a silver resolution introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but take it nevertheless." Suppose some vile man, and of course he would be vile to write such a letter, should have addressed a letter of that character to the President pro tempore of the Senate in his official capacity, that paper, according to the definition of official public documents by the Senator from Vermont would be a paper to which the Senate and the House of Representatives and the whole Government would be entitled. The severity of insinuation it contained would not affect it. It would be, according to the Senator from Vermont, an official paper, and must be preserved for the beck and call of every co ordinate department of Government.

Suppose, to make a still further illustration, some other vile man should have addressed a letter to the presiding officer of this body in which he declared that the President of the United States in his civil service communications had announced, from his interpretation of those communications, that men were only to be removed for cause, and that the Senator who takes the initiatory in framing and forming and maturing the issues with the Executive which shall have the practical effect of enabling the Republican majority on the floor of the Senate to stand between those who held office in this country under former administrations and those who may aspire to it under this will advance himself with that vast army of political implements, that letter too would be an official paper under the definition laid down by the Senator from Vermont to which the Senate and the House, the executive and judicial departments of this Government, would be under any and all circumstances entitled, and to do with it as they pleased.

Mr. President, this country knows that the Senator from Vermont is a lawyer of ability. This country knows that he is a Senator of ability. The Senator from Vermont himself knows after his long years of service in this body, the prominent position which he has occupied in his day touching so many controversies and so many questions of public importance, that the press to which he appealed openly in the course of his argument would give to the country utterances from him which the people of the United States would have a right to receive and accept as in the nature of judicial declarations. Who will undertake to say that any citizen would question for instance a statement of fact and of record made in his place on this floor by the Senator from Vermont? The honor to any man in this life which reaches that measure of public confidence is one not to be despised, but which carries with it or ought to carry with it its full measure of responsibility.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a declaration made by the Senator from Vermont in the report submitted by the Judiciary Committee in this case and to another in the course of his remarks the other day. After stating broadly the right of the Senate to any and all papers which may be found in the Executive Departments of the Government, the report proceeds in this language:

A qualification of this general right may under our Constitution exist in the case of calls by the House of Representatives for papers relating to treaties, &c., under consideration and not yet disposed of by the President and Senate.

In the course of the Senator's remarks he used the language which I shall read, and which I may have occasion hereafter to reread in part at least. After speaking of the Wirtz case, and of General Jackson's attitude toward it, the Senator from Vermont stated as follows:

On every other topic President Jackson, like all his predecessors and like all his successors until to-day, felt bound to and did give to both Houses of Congress every information that they ever called for, excepting as the report of the committee and as the views of the minority state the instance of General Washington, who, while a treaty was pending before the Senate of the United States between us and Great Britain, was called upon by the House of Representatives to send to them copies of the papers and information about that treaty, which he declined to do upon an obvious ground, consistently with all that I have said and which is stated in the report of the majority.

Why did the Senator from Vermont state that this inquiry was addressed to President Washington while a treaty was pending before the Senate of the United States between us and Great Britain? We all know the reverence the American heart has for the great man who led us safely through the Revolution and first occupied the Presidential chair. We all know that the case in which the American people have deliberately reversed his judgment has not occurred. We all know with what power the fact would strike the American mind that President Cleveland stands flat-footed in the position occupied by his illustrious first predecessor. Why would the Senator from Vermont stand on this floor and announce that the treaty between the United States and Great Britain was still pending when that inquiry was made? Would he shut his eyes to the record that lay before him? If he did I will take the liberty of calling his attention to it.

On the 1st day of March, 1796, the following message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation concluded between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty having been duly ratified, and the ratifications having been exchanged at London on the 28th day of October, 1795, I have directed the same to be promulgated; and herewith transmit a copy thereof for the information of Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 1, 1796.

That was the communication by President Washington to the House of Representatives of a consummated treaty between this country and Great Britain—no pending negotiations, but concluded. There was no apology for a refusal to furnish the House of Representatives or the people of the country with the information asked for on the ground that it touched pending negotiations, and if there had been any such difficulty the resolution of the House of Representatives more than covered it. I shall read the resolution passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What is the date?

Mr. KENNA. March 24, I think. I find it in the proceedings of the day prior to the 25th, and I presume Congress met on that day, which would make it the 24th. The resolution passed by the House of Representatives reads as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with the King of Great Britain, communicated by his message of the 1st of March, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty; excepting such of said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed.

The very resolution of the House itself on its face and in terms excepted from its demand upon the President any paper whatever which might touch any unfinished negotiation between this country and Great Britain touching that or any other matter. There was the treaty pending before the House of Representatives and awaiting their action to carry it into effect. There was a matter of practical legislation submitted to that House by the fact of that treaty. There in the Presidential office was General Washington, who, if any mortal man was ever devoid of partisan prejudice was that man, who if any man on earth was ever actuated solely by patriotic, disinterested motive was that man. I will take the liberty of reading an extract or two from his reply:

It does not occur that the inspection of the papers asked for can be relative to any purpose under the cognizance of the House of Representatives, except that of an impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed.

Permit me to say in passing that the Senator from Ohio recently asked from his place on this floor what right the President had to inquire for what reason we asked for documents. General Washington says:

Except that of an impeachment, which the resolution has not expressed. I repeat, that I have no disposition to withhold any information which the duty of my station will permit, or the public good shall require, to be disclosed; and in fact, all the papers affecting the negotiation with Great Britain were laid before the Senate when the treaty itself was communicated for their consideration and advice.

But not to the House. That body was demanding it in vain.

As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request.

G. WASHINGTON.

There for the first time in the history of this Government, upon a respectful demand of the House of Representatives touching the merits of action proposed to be enacted by them to carry into effect a treaty which had been consummated, the President of the United States, in sole regard for the maintenance of the dignity and the prerogatives of his high office which he was sworn to maintain, declined, as he ought to have declined, a proposed intermeddling by the House in something which did not concern it.

The Senator from Vermont made another statement, which, in view of the reliance we have all had upon the accuracy of his researches, somewhat surprised me, I confess. After speaking of the Wirtz case, in which General Jackson declined to send papers asked for by the Senate, the Senator from Vermont said:

That was the end of the affair between General Jackson and the Senate of the United States on the subject of papers about appointments.

"About appointments" comes in there qualifying very appropriately.

We all know the character of General Jackson. There was something peculiar about the Wirtz business which the public does not know and that got the old gentleman indignant; but down to that time every species of resolution touching foreign affairs of the most delicate character, touching the operations of the Army, touching rank in the Army, touching every part of administration which belongs not to the Senate but to the President, and belongs to the President just as exclusively as the power to remove or suspend does, if he had a power to remove, as he did under the law, had been passed by the Senate and answered by the President.

I presume that the Senator from Vermont had forgotten that perhaps the most bitter controversy that has occurred in the history of this Government between either of the branches of the legislative department and the executive occurred between the Senate and President Jackson touching that very question of the transmission of papers on the request of the Senate.

After General Jackson had ordered the removal of the deposits, and had gone so far as to remove a Secretary of the Treasury and substituted him by another in order to effect that removal, it was made known by the public press of the country that in the course of those events he had promulgated to his Cabinet a paper containing his views on that subject. Not only was that paper read to his Cabinet, but it was promulgated to mankind; it went into the newspapers, onto the public highways and byways. Everybody had it. There was no citizen of this Republic, however humble, who had not seen that paper if he wanted to see it. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether a paper under date of the 18th day of September, 1833, purporting to have been read by him to the heads of the several Departments, relating to the deposits of the public money in the Treasury of the United States, and alleged to have been published by his authority, be genuine or not; and if it be genuine, that he be also requested to cause a copy of the said paper to be laid before the Senate.

That was an inquiry touching a document which, as I have stated, had been given to all the world. There was no secrecy, no privilege about it, save and except the privilege of the executive department to protect itself against unwarrantable interference by a co-ordinate department of the Government. But when that interference was attempted it was repudiated in that as in every other instance of that illustrious man. President Jackson's reply was as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have attentively considered the resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate "a copy of the paper which has been published, and which purports to have been read by him to the heads of Executive Departments, dated the 18th day of September last, relating to the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States and its offices."

The executive is a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government equally with the Senate; and I have yet to learn under what constitutional authority that branch of the Legislature has a right to require of me an account of any communication, either verbally or in writing, made to the heads of Departments acting as a Cabinet council. As well might I be required to detail to the Senate the free and private conversation I have held with those officers on any subject relating to their duties and my own.

Feeling my responsibility to the American people, I am willing upon all occasions to explain to them the grounds of my conduct; and I am willing upon all proper occasions to give to either branch of the Legislature any information in my possession that can be useful in the execution of the appropriate duties confided to them.

Knowing the constitutional rights of the Senate, I shall be the last man, under any circumstances, to interfere with them. Knowing those of the Executive, I shall at all times endeavor to maintain them agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution and the solemn oath I have taken to support and defend it.

I am constrained, therefore, by a proper sense of my own self-respect and of the rights secured by the Constitution to the executive branch of the Government, to decline a compliance with your request.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mr. President, there is something said in the report of the majority of the committee which practically adopts the whole report made in 1842, I think, touching the removal of a Mr. Sylvester by Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of War. I shall have occasion later to refer again to that report. I only desire to do so now in order to indicate, as the report itself does, the fact that in that instance when papers touching a removal by the Executive or by one of his principal subordinates were asked for by the Senate they were declined, as they had been by President Jackson and by President Washington before. In his response the Secretary of War said:

The letter dismissing Mr. Sylvester was made a public record of the Department, and I therefore transmit a copy of it herewith, agreeably to your request. There is no other paper of the description specified in your request or relating to the subject on the files of this Department, nor is there any in my possession which is not of a confidential character. The faithful discharge of the duties devolving upon heads of Departments frequently renders it of essential importance to preserve confidential communications he has received as such, and private honor as well as public policy forbids that a pledge thus given should be violated.

A little later a communication was made by the Senate to Mr. Tyler. I beg to say in this connection that these are cases in which the issue was made between the Executive and the Senate. No man denies, so far as I am aware, the perfect freedom of the Senate to call upon the President of the United States for any private letter in his pocket if it chooses; but I take it no rational man will deny the perfect right with the same freedom to decline the invitation of the Senate if the Executive chooses.

In the ordinary friendly intercourse between the executive and legislative departments of this Government, except where some reason satisfactory to the Executive has occurred to prevent it or interfere with it, communications have been made over and over again; and let me say here that communications have been made to the Senate at this session by the present executive department touching some matters involved in this very controversy.

I know a case in my own State, so does the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who sits before me, so does the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who sits before me, in which inquiry was made for papers touching the conduct of an officer before the person nominated assumed the functions of the office. Those papers were sent here as the Executive had the undoubted right to do in response to the inquiry either of the Senate or of a Senator. So the fact that papers have been communicated in this case or in that case, in one case or in many cases, has just about as much to do with the settlement of this issue as the thirty men whom the culprit found who had not seen him steal the pig. They make no issue; they involve no issue. The precedents of constitutional prerogative as it has been ascertained and maintained from Washington to this day are those in which the Executive denies the power of the Senate as a matter of right to apply for or receive such papers.

On the 9th of January, 1844, Mr. Allen submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the Senate, confidentially, the Senate being in executive session, a copy of any instructions which may have been given by the Executive to the American minister in England, on the subject of the title to, and occupation of, the Territory of Oregon since the 4th of March, 1841; also a copy of any correspondence which may have passed between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to that subject since that time.

June 3, 1844; adopted.

The reply of the President was as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, requesting the President to lay before that body, confidentially, "a copy of any instructions which may have been given by the Executive to the American minister in England, on the subject of the title to, and occupation of, the Territory of Oregon since the 4th of March, 1841; also a copy of any correspondence which may have passed between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to the subject since that time," has been received.

In reply, I have to state that in the present state of the subject-matter, to which the resolution refers, it is deemed inexpedient to communicate the information requested by the Senate.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, 6th June, 1844.

And that was the last of that issue, as far as I have been able to discover.

When there had recently been a change of administration, and, without going fully into details, when the administration was in harmony with Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts, who occupied a seat on the floor of the Senate, Mr. Bradbury submitted a resolution for consideration, which I shall read. This was in 1849, and I beg the Senate to observe the precise analogy of the resolution to the whole line of inquiry which now in one form and another is addressed to the present Executive. Mr. Bradbury's resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate all charges which have been preferred or filed in any of the Departments against individuals who have been removed from office since the 4th day of March last, with a specification of the cases, if any, in which the officers charged have had an opportunity to be heard, and a statement of the number of removals made under each Department.

That resolution went through a long trial in the Senate. It came up time after time; it was set for one special occasion after another; it strung out through the whole of one session and through nearly the whole of the next one, and it finally died within this Chamber, or the old one, as all similar resolutions ought to have done. However, in the course of the debate on that resolution Mr. Webster, who it was so well understood had taken strong ground against the constitutional power of removal by the President, made a speech, from which I propose to read. I state that there had been a change of administration in those days, without reference to the fact that there has been recently a change of administration, and some one had gotten mad in those days without the remotest intimation that anybody is mad now. Mr. Bradbury offered the resolution, which is in line and in keeping with those which caused this controversy. Mr. Webster was in the Senate, and I beg to read a brief passage from a speech made by him on the subject of the propriety of the resolution which I have read. Mr. Webster said:

But, sir, since the practice has become a settled practice, since every administration has indulged in it, and since it must now be considered, as the legal construction of the Constitution, that it is one of the powers of the President to remove incumbents from offices which they hold, it follows, as a necessary and as an inevitable consequence, that this power, thus legally vested in the President, must be exercised by him as independently of our control as any other power that is to be exercised by him under the Constitution. If he holds the power, he holds it to be exercised at his own control and discretion. And I see no ground upon which we can call upon him to give us reasons for the manner in which he exercises that power, any more than we can call upon him to give reasons for the manner in which he exercises any other power under the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

The powers of the Departments are not all mixed up in a jumble.

In the hurry of the discussion I was about to omit to read two papers which I believe I am right in saying I did not read, and without which I hardly believe that the discussion would be even approaching to what from my standpoint it ought to be. Among the archives of the State Department there is an old and very interesting record which shows the preparation by Mr. Webster of a form not for the transmission of papers, but for the declination to transmit papers to the United States Senate. It is an old and a venerable document, prepared not long after his great war with President Jackson. As it is in line and keeping with what I have quoted from his observations, I want to read the substance of two letters:

To honorable ——.

These are mere forms. I am not aware that any one of them was ever communicated to the Senate. I only know from the fact of their preparation that they were very maturely deliberated upon and prepared carefully, and ready for communication while Mr. Webster was Secretary of State when the occasion required. It is suggested to me that the papers are in his handwriting, but of that fact I am not sure of my personal knowledge.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the ——, desiring me to send you the papers on file relating to the nomination of —— —— to be ——.

The letters accompanying this will be, I presume, very satisfactory testimonials of Mr. —— fitness for the office; but I take occasion to say, that, in this Department letters of this description, though usually communicated on request to the Senate or its committees, unless in peculiar cases there be reason for withholding them, are not considered as public letters, and therefore are not placed on the official files. When sent to the Senate, or its committees, they are understood to be sent in confidence, and it is expected that they will be returned when the occasion has passed.

I am, sir, &c.

To Hon. ——,
Chairman of the Committee on —— of the Senate.

That is one. Another reads as follows:

Hon. —— ——,
Chairman of the Committee on —— of the Senate:

Letters recommending individuals to office are not considered as official communications any more than verbal recommendations. They are not kept on the public files, and it has not always been the case heretofore, as I learn, that they have been preserved. So far as may be proper, however, it will give the Department great pleasure to afford the committee any information in its possession. I send you several communications respecting the persons mentioned in your letter, which, when examined by the committee, I will thank you to cause to be returned.

Well, Webster did not live to this day and generation to witness the conditions which are now about to be brought about in that very line.

There was a partial change of administration in 1874. A House of Representatives largely Democratic was elected in that year, and the House in which the Democrats controlled the majority met the following year. They were rather unused to power in those days, and one of the first things they undertook to do was to inquire of President Grant something about the manner in which he exercised his executive functions. They went even so far as to ask him where he did it; they may have intended to ask him when; they undoubtedly asked him how; and as illustrative of the views of that distinguished man while he occupied the White House I crave the privilege of reading a short extract from his answer to that inquiry. It is dated May 4, 1876. President Grant said:

I have never hesitated, and shall not hesitate, to communicate to Congress, and to either branch thereof, all the information which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to give, or which my judgment may suggest to me, or a request from either House may indicate to me, will be useful in the discharge of the appropriate duties confided to them. I fail, however, to find in the Constitution of the United States the authority given to the House of Representatives (one branch of the Congress in which is vested the legislative power of the Government) to require of the Executive—an independent branch of the Government co-ordinate with the Senate and House of Representatives—an account of his discharge of his appropriate and purely executive offices, acts, and duties, either as to when, where, or how performed.

What the House of Representatives may require as a right in its demand upon the Executive for information is limited to what is necessary for the proper discharge of its powers of legislation or of impeachment.

The inquiry in the resolution of the House as to where executive acts have, within the last seven years, been performed, and at what distance from any particular spot, or for how long a period at any one time, &c., does not necessarily belong to the province of legislation. It does not profess to be asked for that object.

Why is it that Senators will rise on this floor and declare that the Executive has no right to know for what purpose we call for papers, when in every instance, from the foundation of the Government to this day, where any issue of any kind has arisen between the two co-ordinate branches of the Government, the President has assumed the right to know, and not knowing has declined to communicate the papers demanded in such a manner?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] addressed the Senate some days ago on this subject of the communication of papers. Among other things he said:

That we have a right to call for information of any kind whatever in any Department of the Government, whether it be by written order or by parol, I do not think there is the slightest doubt. Indeed, but for that we could not legislate; but for that we could not act wisely in executive session.

He said again, and I desire to call especial attention to his language, in answer to an interruption:

Let me have my say, if my friend will allow me. There was no doubt about that—

Speaking of the construction of this same law—

The idea of a distinction between papers public and private in the public records never occurred until during the present administration and to meet an exigency.

The Senator from Vermont, alluding to the case of Arthur and Cornell and to the action of President Hayes, made a statement to which I desire to call attention. He said:

In that connection I ought to call your attention—I seem to have mislaid the papers—to the proceedings that took place in this body on the removal of Mr. Arthur and Mr. Cornell as collector and naval officer at New York and the appointment of their successors.

I do not want to read the whole extract, but simply a sufficient part to give application to what I propose to say:

I think I am safe in saying that neither the President of the United States nor the Secretary of the Treasury nor any other of his advisers ever entertained the thought for a moment that it was not the right of the Senate of the United States to go to the bottom of the whole affair and have every fact and every reason that it desired to have or thought would be of any use to it in acting intelligently upon the subject.

For the first time in the history of this Government and to meet an emergency, says the Senator from Ohio, this distinction between a public and a private paper is submitted. Neither President Hayes nor his Secretary of the Treasury ever dreamed of it. And, says the Senator from Vermont, the Senate has a right to go to the bottom of the whole affair. With the permission of the Senate we will go to the bottom of the whole affair, and I will ask the Secretary to read a letter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 17, 1877.

SIR: Your letter dated the 15th instant was received only this morning, and I take the earliest moment to reply to it.

To answer in an official way the questions put to me would not only compel me to violate that trust and confidence reposed in me by the President, necessary for the transaction of the business of this Department, but to disclose papers of a confidential character filed in the Department and require me to enter into the discussion of questions totally immaterial to the nominations submitted to the Senate. I do not think it within the just limits of the intercourse of the Senate with executive officers to answer in writing, or even verbally, all the questions submitted by you, nor have I ever known such an instance.

The President has the power to nominate to the Senate a proper person for collector of the port of New York, whether that office be already vacant or not, and it is within the power of the Senate to either confirm or reject.

These are independent powers. No law requires the President to give the reasons for his nominations, and it does not appear that in this case the Senate even has directed this inquiry. The tenure-of-office act required of the President the reasons of a suspension made during the recess of the Senate, but this provision, after a very brief period, was repealed. To answer your questions would compel me to state to a committee of the Senate the reasons of an appointment by the President, to disclose confidential communications between the President and the Secretary, and to enter into an arraignment and accusation of the officers superseded. In the free exercise of independent powers it is the common practice, as we both know, for members of the Senate to have full conference with the heads of Executive Departments on all matters in which the concurrent action of the President and the Senate is required, and therefore it will give me pleasure to confer with the committee, or any member of it, on the subject of the fitness of the appointment of Mr. Roosevelt to the office of collector of the port of New York.

It will also give me pleasure to furnish to you, or to the Committee on Commerce, or to any member of the committee, in the usual way, the several reports of the commission on the New York custom-house, upon which mainly the action of the President was taken. As the investigation progressed these reports made it of the highest public importance that a change should be made in the leading officers of that service. It was because abuses were thus developed that the President was convinced that it was incompatible with the public service to retain in their present positions the collector and naval officer.

The other cases mentioned by you under the same envelope will be governed by what is here stated, and within these limits I will be happy to confer with you or the committee at your convenience.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Mr. KENNA. I very respectfully submit now that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will find on reflection that "this emergency" is not the first time when he has heard of the distinction being made in the papers in the Departments of this Government as between a private and a public paper.

I propose now to state what I believe to be the simple truth, and to state it candidly and I state it deliberately, that, looking at the history of this controversy from the day of its inception down to this moment in the light of every fact and every detail it has developed, the one question and the only question involved in this entire procedure is the single one as to whether the present chief of the executive department of this Government shall be allowed in fulfillment of his obligations to the people to administer it through agencies of his own choice, or be compelled by the obstructive power of a majority in the Senate to be held by the public to an accountability for an administration of his high office through agencies not only not of his choice, but agencies lacking his confidence, unworthy of his faith, wanting in the approval of his judgment, and actually interested in a multitude of cases in bringing him and his administration into disrepute.

That is the whole of this case, regard it as you may, darken it by a multiplicity of words, inaugurate these inquiries by demands for reasons for suspensions, multiply the inquiries by demands for papers which show them, take one other step backward and modify your request again and ask for the papers on file, one still further step backward and ask for the conduct of the former incumbent in the office as the resolution in Duskin's case has done, and in the eyes of the Senate and in the eyes of the whole country the issue is presented in the one form at last, and that is whether a Democratic administration shall appropriately perform its functions in the face of a negative and obstructive majority on the other side of the Chamber. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair) rapped for order and said: Expressions of approval or disapproval are not permitted in the galleries.

Mr. KENNA. Why, Mr. President, let me show to the Senate the form in which this demand is presented to the executive department. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] declared that we have no right to demand the reasons of the Executive. No Senator on this floor has ever contended or asserted that we have a right to ask for the reasons which have actuated the Executive in making a suspension from office; and yet let the Secretary read the letter which I send to the desk, and see where this controversy began.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 5, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the accompanying nomination of Samuel Flower, vice P. Felix Herwig, supended, will you please communicate to the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, the reasons for such suspension, or the papers on file in your Department which show the reasons for this suspension.

Very truly, yours,

JUSTIN S. MORRILL, Chairman.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. KENNA. That was the beginning of this controversy; that was the issue which was first presented to this administration by the Senate through one of its committees, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who declared on this floor that we had no right to ask reasons of the Executive is a member of the committee which sent that communication. Sir, I may be more or less of a partisan than many others; I may go further than more conservative men in my theory of what the election of a President of the United States means. I think I know, if I know anything, that when you take the marshals and the collectors and the consuls, the postmasters and all the vast numbers of officers throughout the length and breadth of this country, organized as by their appointments under former administrations they have been organized into a great political agency, the people of this country having a right to demand a change; however hurtful to the popular instinct these agencies may be, that change can only be effected by the election of a President to carry out the public will.

When the people of the United States elected Grover Cleveland to the Presidency it was not more a choice of men than a choice of means and instrumentalities. The change to make this Government conform to the popular will may involve the proposition that marshals shall go, that collectors shall go, that postmasters shall go, that consuls shall go, and that ministers shall go, all of them so far as they are agents in the administration necessary to carry out its policy shall go. On the theory of political selection and the bringing the machinery of government into harmony with its general policies they may all have to go. They all ought to go. But the naked question is as to the power of the President of the United States in the exercise of the functions of his office to adapt his administration by all the agencies which surround it to the performance of the duties which he has in charge.

It has been said, however, I need not say where, that the present Executive had committed himself against making changes in office; that his civil-service letter to Mr. Curtis, that his inaugural message, and that various utterances from him had placed him in a position in which it was enough to damn and blacken the character of any man to be removed by him; that an officer's suspension means and must mean that the incumbent removed is injured in character and reputation. I have read, I think with as much care as I was capable, every utterance of the President on this subject, and I have gone through the utterances of his predecessors on a similar line, and in the course of my inquiries I think I find that the declaration was made very early in our history which practically covers the position now occupied by President Cleveland. I beg to read from a letter written by Mr. Jefferson on March 29, 1801:

The right of opinion shall suffer no invasion from me. Those who have acted well have nothing to fear, however they may have differed from me in opinion; those who have done ill, however, have nothing to hope.

Where is the declaration in any communication of President Cleveland stronger than that; and yet in that same connection, consistently with every word that I have read, Mr. Jefferson went on to say in that and in other letters:

All appointments to civil offices during pleasure, made after the event of the election was certainly known to Mr. Adams, are considered as nullities. I do not view the persons appointed as even candidates for the office, but make others without noticing or notifying them. Mr. Adams's best friends have agreed this is right. 2. Officers who have been guilty of official malconduct are proper subjects of removal. 3. Good men to whom there is no objection but a difference of political principle, practiced on only as far as the right of a private citizen will justify, are not proper subjects of removal, except in the case of attorneys and marshals. The courts being so decidedly Federal and irremovable, it is believed that Republican attorneys and marshals, being the doors of entrance into the courts, are indispensably necessary as a shield to the Republican part of our fellow-citizens, which, I believe, is the main body of the people.

Going on then to declare that the Republican element which he represented would finally procure its just share in the administration by deaths, resignations, &c., in part, he proceeds in this wise:

To these means of obtaining a just share in the transaction of the public business shall be added one other, to wit, removal for electioneering activity or open and industrious opposition to principles of the present government, legislative and executive. Every officer of the Government may vote at elections according to his conscience, but we should betray the cause committed to our care were we to permit the influence of official patronage to be used to overthrow that cause.

Mr. Jefferson thought it consistent with the declaration that political opinion should suffer no invasion by him, that those who had acted well in their places should have nothing to fear, and those who had acted ill had nothing to hope. Nevertheless, he would conform his administration to his own policy in the disposal of every office within his gift. Now, let us see what President Cleveland has said on this subject, and see whether his declarations are any broader and whether his reservations are not as broad. He said:

There is a class of Government positions which are not within the letter of the civil-service statute, but which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration—

In the very outset of this declaration, in the very first sentence of this declaration, in its very first clause is a recognition of the fact that persons occupying certain places whose official duties are connected with the policy of the adminstration are subject to removal; and every effort to disguise or misrepresent that letter has been an attempt to put the present Executive in a false position, rendering him apparently inconsistent because of his removal of Republican politicians from office—which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration that the removal therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed solely on partisan grounds, and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power; but many men holding such positions have forfeited all just claim to retention—

Many holding positions for terms fixed by law, but still disconnected with the policy of the administration—because they have used their places for party purpose in disregard of their duty to the people, and because, instead of being decent public servants, they have proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management. The lessons of the past should be unlearned, and such officials, as well as their successors, should be taught that efficiency, fitness, and devotion to public duty are the conditions of their continuance in public place, and that the quiet and unobtrusive exercise of individual political rights is the reasonable measure of their party service.

Now, I ask any candid man in the Senate if every line in that letter which bears on this subject is not in precise accordance with the utterances of Mr. Jefferson? And I ask further if any candid man can ascribe to the President by virtue of these utterances any embarrassment whatever in such attempt as he may have made to conform the administration of the Government in all its departments not only to the principles which he espoused, but to the principles and policies upon which he was elected.

The question is his power to do this, and upon that question I desire to say a few words, presenting succinctly my own view of a subject which has been one of much discussion, involving the true interpretation of the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." (Article 2, section 1, clause 1.) It will be observed that the Constitution does not provide that the executive power shall be vested in a President and Congress or in a President and the Senate or in a President and the House of Representatives or in a President and in anybody else, but in a President.

The Constitution further provides that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed" (article 2, section 3), and "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint," &c. (Article 2, section 2, clause 2.)

Looking to the Constitution, in the absence of this last clause, it is not difficult to perceive the purpose for which the practically uniform construction of a hundred years has declared the clause to have been inserted. In its absence the President, upon whom was broadly conferred the executive power of the Government, would have had complete control over both appointment to office and removal from it.

The power either to appoint or to remove could never have been asserted as a legislative power—it is repugnant to the whole idea of legislation. Congress, in the very nature of its organism, could not exercise it. The numbers embraced in its bodies, the infrequency of their sessions, the periods of their vacations, the physical obstructions in the way of their constant attention to a subject which, in order to maintain the Government in the full operation of all its functions, would have required and has required constant treatment as well as the inherent quality and definition of legislative character, combined to preclude the idea that in any sense the power to appoint or to remove could be embraced in legislative range. This proposition is conceded in practice even by those who deny it in word, because in every quarter where the Senate is asserted to be a part of the appointing power it is continually asserted to possess, to that extent, executive functions.

"We are executive officers also," said the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] recently, "because we participate to a certain extent with the President in making an appointment." So on all hands, notwithstanding Mr. Webster's great assault on the right and power of removal as an inherent executive function, that function whether claimed to be vested exclusively in the President, or in the President and Senate jointly, or to be subject to regulation and control by Congress has been accepted as embraced within the definition of executive powers. It is useless to deny that it could not have been vested in the courts, for nobody anywhere has ever asserted for the judiciary further power over the subject than such as has been conferred touching inferior officers under the express language of the Constitution.

Thus, in the absence of the clause referred to, the full control over both removals and appointments would have stood vested in the President. There was nowhere else to put it. Its classification carried it to the Executive as an inherent and necessary part of executive prerogative, and no construction can take it away. But while the general clause was allowed to stand without qualification, conferring full power of removal upon the President, the power of appointment was subjected to that measure of supervision by the Senate which gave it a negative voice against selections by the President for office. This is a negative power, touching only the matter of appointment; it reaches no further; it is exceptional; it is a single qualification limiting a general grant, and it is to be construed strictly. Thus, the power of removal is vested exclusively in the President.

The power of nomination is a function pertaining exclusively to the President and it is as independent an executive act as any other provided by the Constitution.

The right to give or withhold advice and consent is confided to the Senate. It is likewise an independent act of the Senate, but it reaches only the appointment.

After the advice and consent of the Senate the power of appointment is still an independent, separate, and distinct power of the President. He may nominate a person to office; the Senate may advise and consent to the appointment, and still the President may make or not make the appointment at his pleasure. The Senate is no part of the appointing power. It can exercise no more the power of appointment than the President can exercise the power of legislation.

The difference is that the President may exercise a qualified negative over the power of Congress to pass a law, the Senate may exercise actual negative against a particular appointment to office. But the power of the Executive in comparison is even broader, for he is obliged by the Constitution to recommend to Congress legislation which he deems the public welfare to demand, while the Senate within the constitutional range can not even suggest to him the name of the best and ablest citizen of the Republic to the commonest and humblest office. Thus the Constitution stands, and thus, with a single exception born of political excitement and bitterness and arbitrary power in 1867, which will be discussed hereafter, the Constitution has been construed by every department of the Government for a hundred years.

The debate of 1789 is so familiar to the Senate that it is useless for me to undertake to discuss it. We all know that upon the bills for the establishment of the Department of Foreign Affairs, as the Department of State was then called, and the establishment of the War Department and the establishment of the Treasury Department, the great debate arose for the first time and in the First Congress which involved the question of the power of the Executive to remove from office. We all know how ably Mr. Madison led that debate, so ably, indeed, that no discussion of the question has occurred from that day to this which is not practically based upon his utterances at that time. We all know further that so jealous were that Congress of the impairment of the prerogative of either of the co-ordinate departments of this Government, that when the very bill on the Calendar conferred upon the Executive the right to remove the Secretary of War the provision was stricken out and so amended and reinserted as to make it a confession of the power as a constitutional prerogative and not a conferring of it by an act of the Legislature. Mr. Chancellor Kent, in discussing this precedent, says:

This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that Department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it.

In the Opinions of the Attorneys-General—I do not want to read elaborately—the same matter has been discussed at considerable length, and, I believe, with a pretty general concurrence of views. In volume 2 of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, page 1419, I read the conclusion of an opinion of the then Attorney-General, Mr. Legaré:

If any authority were needed to enforce considerations which seem so obvious and conclusive in themselves, I think the celebrated debate on the power of removal in the First Congress would furnish it. The whole country seems to have acquiesced in the argument of Mr. Madison in favor of that power, drawn from the character of executive power and responsibility and from the irresistible necessity of the case.

From the same volume, page 2123, from an opinion of Attorney-General Crittenden, I read as follows:

That the President has, by the Constitution of the United States, the power of removing civil officers appointed and commissioned by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, where the Constitution itself has not otherwise provided, by fixing the tenure during good behavior, has been long since settled, and has ceased to be a subject of controversy or doubt.

In the great debate which arose upon that question in the House of Representatives shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, Mr. Madison is reported to have said: "It is absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him in a peculiar manner responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt."

And the determination of Congress was in accordance with his views, and has been since invariably followed in practice by every President of the United States.

I hold in my hand now a book from which I desire to read a single sentence from each one of two volumes. I read from Bancroft's History of the Constitution of the United States. At the beginning of the first volume he says:

Scarcely one who wished me good speed when I first essayed to trace the history of America remains to greet me with a welcome as I near the goal. Deeply grateful as I am for the friends who rise up to gladden my old age, their encouragement must renew my grief for those who have gone before me.

I read that single clause to indicate the time, labor, and thought given by that gentleman to the writing of the history of the American Constitution. If there be in all this wide world an entirely disinterested authority on this great subject, I believe none will deny that it is to be found in that book. On page 190 of the second volume, after discussing the failure to establish an executive council in the convention which framed the Constitution, he says:

The failure to establish an efficient council led the convention most reluctantly to vest the Senate with some control over acts of the Executive.

The failure of the project for an executive council led the convention most reluctantly to invest the Senate with some control over the acts of the Executive. On the next page he says:

Had the consent of the Senate been made necessary to displace as well as to appoint, the Executive would have suffered degradation; and the relative importance of the House of Representatives a grave diminution. To change the tenure of office from the good opinion of the President, who is the employer and needs efficient agents in executing the laws, to the favor of the Senate, which has no executive powers, would create a new fealty alien to the duties of an officer of the United States.

So, sir, we came to 1820 in our history. What was known as the first tenure-of-office act was passed in that year, limiting to four years the duration of certain public offices. At the end of that act was placed the power of removal from office at pleasure. So that up to that time there was no let or hinderance about the constitutional power or prerogative of the Executive to remove incumbents from office. Speaking of the clause which limited the tenure to four years, Mr. Jefferson, writing to Mr. Madison, said:

It is more baneful than the attempt which failed in the beginning of the Government to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate.

And in replying to that letter Mr. Madison said:

If the principle of the late statute be a sound one, nothing is necessary but to limit appointments held during pleasure to a single year, or the next meeting of Congress, in order to make the pleasure of the Senate a tenure of office instead of the President alone.

Then came the great debate of 1835. It has been alluded to very often and it will doubtless be alluded to oftener hereafter; that debate in which Webster, Clay, and Calhoun were united in a common assault upon the Executive power over removals; that debate which was aimed at the passage of an act restraining the power of removal; a debate which resulted likewise in a failure by the House of Representatives to concur in that construction of the Constitution, and the failure of the proposed law. Fifty years after, characterizing that debate and those who conspicuously figured in it, the contemporary comments of an eminent man are instructive as well as interesting.

At the session of Congress in 1835—

Says the author from whom I read—an organized assault upon the President's power of removal was made in the Senate, in which the champion of nullification and the champions of a national bank were conspicuous leaders. Jackson had crushed nullification and killed the bank, and the embittered champions of both united in an attempt to cripple and curb his power. The record of that abortive experiment appears in the journals and debates of the Senate, and it is full of instruction.

The coalition of Webster, Calhoun, and Clay upon that occasion was unnatural, and in the nature of things could not endure. They were rivals for public favor, and all of them aspirants for the Presidency; their constitutional views were inharmonious and to a great extent conflicting, and it was very certain that if successful in putting down Jackson they would break with each other. In fact they did break apart within twenty-four months, with mutual reproaches and recrimination. But for a time their union was, apparently, earnest and sincere. If not one of affection, it was was at least one of common interest and common passions. And those men came to the encounter with the President fully equipped for war. They were in the highest credit as leaders of debate; their speeches went everywhere, and reached and were read by all. The woodchopper in the forests of Maine, the planter by the Southern gulf, the pioneer of the far West, and the banker, merchant, and workman in the great cities of the East, were alike delighted and charmed by them, and now and hereafter the scholar in his study must indorse and applaud the contemporary popular judgment upon their merits.

Mr. Calhoun brought to debate a power of analysis and a clearness of thought which no speaker in the American Congress has ever excelled. His style was masterly for his purpose. No meretricious ornament disfigured, and no diffuseness weakened it. It was clear, strong, simple, condensed. His language was, in fact, as simple and as pure as Franklin's, and, like that great master of composition, he commanded fit words at will. To hear him was to believe in his sincerity, in his candor, in the depth and integrity of his convictions. In delivery he combined earnestness with dignity, and the known purity of his life added a moral sanction to his spoken words.

Mr. Webster, as a speaker on great occasions, ranks, perhaps, first among Americans. In parliamentary eloquence he was, in some respects, superior to Burke, and it may be predicted with confidence that his reputation will endure. He will be honorably mentioned when the great speakers of the world are classified, and their performances are reviewed. He was not "godlike," but he was great, and his blows in controversy were the blows of a giant.

For immediate effect upon an audience the speeches of Mr. Clay were not inferior to those of his coadjutors. In fire, dash, and enthusiasm, he was a very Rupert of debate, and in impassioned retort a master. In demeanor and delivery impressive and graceful, he was yet upon occasion terrible in invective, and sometimes overbearing in will. He was fitted to lead in great struggles—to win admiration from foes—and to take, as of right, a splendid position in the history of his time.

These were the men who stood forward to question the removing power of the President and to deprive that power of all logical support. But they wholly disagreed with each other about the source of the power, and also, in the main, about its regulation. The argument of each one of them was destructive of the arguments of the others. Their views were not only diverse, but inconsistent, and not only inconsistent, but contradictory. One of them derived the power from the power to appoint, and vested it by implication in the President and Senate; another, admitting its executive nature, placed the control and regulation of it in Congress, by virtue of the last clause of the eighth section of the first article; the third argued inconclusively—against all reason and authority—that it was rather legislative than executive in its nature, and therefore classed it among the incidental powers of Congress!

If anything were needed to confirm our acceptance and approval of the Marshall and Madison expositions of the appointing and removing powers of the Government it would be furnished by that debate of 1835. Before questioning the settled construction of the Constitution upon the subject of removals from office, "the dauntless three" should have at least agreed upon the new construction to be substituted for it, and prepared themselves to vindicate the new departure by harmonious and consistent reasoning.

Mr. Clay apologized for the fact that for then forty-six years the power of removal had been conceded under the Constitution to the President by saying that no abuse of it had occurred, and hence there had been no necessity for raising the question; but if the power were not conferred upon the President by the Constitution, in the absence of the conferring of it by law a single act would have been an abuse, a multitude of those acts a multitude of abuses; and the facts do not account for the absence of statutory enactment within that period. Speaking of the power of removal by the President—I read from 2 Calhoun's Works, page 330—Mr. Calhoun said:

But while I thus severely condemn the conduct of the President in removing the former Secretary and appointing the present, I must say, that, in my opinion, it is a case of the abuse, and not of the usurpation of power. The President has the right of removal from office. The power of removal, wherever it exists, does, from necessity, involve the power of general supervision; nor can I doubt that it might be constitutionally exercised in reference to the deposits.

Only a year later, and only when that gentleman was involved in a war with the President, only when he was called on to sustain the issue which now confronts us, did he suddenly discover that the general clause vesting Congress with power to carry the granted powers into execution conferred on Congress the right to legislate on the subject, and to take away the powers under the form of regulation. Up to that time he, as Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster, had agreed that by the daily practice of the Government the Constitution conferred on the President the power of removal, and until there was war between them not a single one of the great trio questioned the power. Mr. Webster declared in the same line of discussion:

In the first place, then, I have to say, that I did not vote for the resolution on the mere ground of the removal of Mr. Duane from the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Although I disapprove of the removal altogether, yet the power of removal does exist in the President, according to the established construction of the Constitution; and therefore, although in a particular case it may be abused, and, in my opinion, it was abused in this case, yet its exercise can not be justly said to be an assumption or usurpation.

Not long afterward, in making his speech in which he assailed the executive prerogative of removal from office, and at the same time that he supported a bill expressly conceding it, he yet accepted it as a settled proposition in the following language:

The bill, it is to be observed, expressly recognizes and admits the actual existence of the power of removal. I do not mean to deny, and the bill does not deny, that at the present moment the President may remove these officers at will, because the early decision adopted that construction, and the laws have since uniformly sanctioned it. The law of 1820, intended to be repealed by this bill, expressly affirms the power. I consider it, therefore, a settled point; settled by construction, settled by precedent, settled by the practice of the Government, and settled by statute.

So, Mr. President, as Mr. Morton in the debate of 1869 declared, the question of the power of removal by the President of the United States as a function vested in him by the Constitution was for seventy-eight long years acquiesced in by every department of this Government. Those years embraced the period from the beginning of the Government to 1867, when an anomalous condition of things arose with which we are all familiar. I would devote a few words to it but for the fact that another has done so in so much better language than I can hope to do.

I received a day or two ago the second volume of a book entitled "Twenty Years of Congress," written by Mr. James G. Blaine, a former member of the Senate, a former Secretary of State, a former member of the House of Representatives, a former Speaker of the House of Representatives, a gentleman who came within a fraction over a thousand votes of being in a position to be the happy recipient of the warfare on the executive power which is now proposed to be consummated by the resolutions on your desk. Of course that war would have come all the same; of course if there had been a thousand votes different in New York it never would have affected the attitude of a great majority on this floor! Of course if the result had been the other way instead of the way it was, our friends constituting a majority here would have made the same warfare upon James G. Blaine, their Executive, elected by them, as they are engaged in now with Mr. Cleveland, who was elected by somebody else. Mr. Blaine, speaking his mind on this as he has had the habit of doing on all topics, speaking of the act of 1867, says:

The bill was not passed, however, without considerable misgiving on the part of many members of both Houses who voted for it. It was an extreme proposition—a new departure from the long-established usage of the Federal Government, and for that reason, if for no other, personally degrading to the incumbent of the Presidential office. It could only have grown out of abnormal excitement created by the dissensions between the two great departments of the Government. The bitterness engendered resembled that which always distinguishes a family quarrel. The measure was resorted to as one of self-defense against the alleged aggressions and the unrestrained power of the executive department. But the history of its operation and of its subsequent modification, which practically amounted to its repeal, is one to which the Republican party can not recur with any sense of pride or satisfaction. As matter of fact, a Republican Congress, largely composed of the same members who had enacted the law, indirectly confessed two years later that it could not be maintained. Regarded only in the light of expediency at the time, it could readily be demonstrated (as was afterward admitted by candid men among those who supported it) to be a blunder—a blunder all the more censurable because the act was not needed to uphold the reconstruction policy of Congress, in aid of which it was devised.

While I have this book in my hand I will take the liberty of reading what the distinguished author says on the subject of the act of 1869, which was passed pretty nearly by the same men who passed that of 1867, and of which he speaks as follows:

When the bill reached the Senate, there was a disposition on the part of some leading members of that body to pass it as promptly as it had been passed by the House. Mr. Morton urged that it be put on its passage without referring it; but the Senate was not prepared for such haste, and, on motion of Mr. Trumbull, the bill was sent to the Judiciary Committee. That committee reported it without delay to the Senate, with an amendment in the form of a substitute. The House bill was a simple repeal in the fewest possible words. The Judiciary Committee now proposed that instead of an absolute repeal, the tenure-of-office act "be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the next session of Congress."

This was a lame and impotent conclusion, and did not command the support or even the respect of the Senate. Mr. Thurman, a member of the committee that reported it, made haste to announce that he had not approved it. He treated the proposition for suspension as a practical confession that the tenure-of-office act "is to be enforced when it will have no practical effect, and is not to be enforced when it will have practical effect." The chief defenders of the proposition to suspend the act were Mr. Trumbull, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. Schurz. Mr. EDMUNDS, pressed by Mr. Grimes to furnish a good reason for suspending the act, replied that "owing to the peculiar circumstances that have attended the last administration it is desirable that there should be an immediate and general removal of the office-holders of the country as a rule, and as an agency for that removal, subject to our approval when we meet again in confirmation of their successors, these bad men being put out, we are willing to trust this Executive with that discretion."

Mr. Blaine proceeds:

Coming from a Senator of the United States, this declaration was regarded as extraordinary. The "bad men" to whom Mr. EDMUNDS referred were the appointees of President Johnson, and every one of them had been confirmed by the Senate of the United States when the Republicans had more than two-thirds of the body. If these appointees were "bad men," why, it was pertinently and forcibly asked by the aggrieved, did not Mr. EDMUNDS submit proof of the fact to his Republican associates and procure their rejection? He knew, the accused men declared, as much about their characters when their names were before the Senate as he knew now when he sought, behind the protection of his privilege, to brand them with infamy. To permit them to be confirmed in the silence and confidence of an executive session, and then in open Senate, when their places were wanted for others, to describe them as "bad men," seemed to them a procedure not to be explained on the broad principles of statesmanship, or even on the common law of fair dealing.

* * * * * * *

The amendment of the Judiciary Committee providing for a suspension of the law until Congress should meet again—a period of about eight months—was so objectionable that it won no substantial support from Senators. There was something so baldly and shamelessly partisan in the proposition to suspend the act just long enough to permit President Grant, without obstruction or incumbrance, to remove the Democrats whom President Johnson had appointed to office that the common instinct of justice, and even of public decency, revolted.

The tenure-of-office act was either right or wrong, expedient or inexpedient, constitutional or unconstitutional, and it was easy to see that men could honestly differ as to its character in these respects. But it was impossible to comprehend how a candid legislator could maintain the constitutionality and expediency of the act, and then propose to suspend it for that specific period of General Grant's administration, when, if needed at all, it would be most needed. Within the eight months next ensuing the President would probably make more removals and appointments than for the remainder of his term, and it was just for this period that Mr. Trumbull, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. Schurz urged that the law be made inoperative—inoperative in order that removals of Democratic office-holders for good cause, and for no cause except that they were Democrats, might in every way be expedited.

There is much in this chapter relevant to this particular feature of this controversy which I should like to read, but I do not desire to take the time to do it. I will, however, read the closing paragraph, which I commend to those who aided in the enactment of the law of 1867 and so soon after participated in the enactment of the law of 1869. Concluding a passage on that subject, Mr. Blaine says:

Casting off all political disguises and personal pretenses—

And why should we not do that? We ought to do it here; we ought to do it now, so that we may understand this matter precisely as it is—

Casting off all political disguises and personal pretenses, the simple truth remains that the tenure-of-office law was enacted lest President Johnson should remove Republican office-holders too rapidly; and it was practically repealed lest President Grant should not remove Democratic office-holders rapidly enough.

[Laughter.]

The Senator from Vermont was in Congress when both those laws were passed. He gave his very active adherence to the proposition of the first one, and then proposed to suspend for eight months the act of 1867 by the act of 1869. He it was, I think, who made the motion to recommit the bill providing for the suspension, and it was recommitted, and the bill reported was rapidly passed with only a slight amendment. I want to do that Senator the justice, however, to show you to-day the consistency, the absolute and perfect consistency, of his support of the act of 1867 and his support of the modification in the act of 1869. Referring to the debate in 1867, I find him making this declaration:

But the committee have recommended the adoption of this rule respecting the tenure of officers as a permanent and systematic and, as they believe, an appropriate regulation of the Government for all administrations and for all time.

This was in 1867—"for all administrations and for all time." "All administrations," you see, were not broad enough to cover it, but "for all time" the law was to be enacted; and still that proposition was not broad enough. The Senator, on another day in the course of the debate, made use of this language:

I do not, therefore, choose to submit to the imputation for a single moment that there is, either in this bill or out of it, in respect to the spirit in which it is proposed, any attempt to advance anybody's political views whatever, or to aid anybody's friends.

That was in 1867. Now, in order that I may not be misunderstood, I want to read the last clause over again:

I do not, therefore, choose to submit to the imputation for a single moment that there is, either in this bill or out of it, in respect to the spirit in which it is proposed, any attempt to advance anybody's political views whatever or to aid anybody's friends.

I read now from the Globe for March, 1869, page 107, and from a speech by the Senator from Vermont, in which he said:

Now, what do we propose to do? We propose, in order as we had hoped to meet the views of our own political friends, who had seen, or thought they had seen, practical difficulties in administration under this law, to give, by an act of generous confidence in the present Executive, to him during the next recess of Congress a complete power to sweep out of office the persons who now hold it.

I assert without the fear of successful contradiction that the Senator from Vermont was perfectly consistent in both declarations, for he was working for his political friends like a Turk in 1867, and like a beaver in 1869, and that is the whole spirit and the meaning and effect of this controversy here to-day. Let this country understand that a party which commanded a majority in both Houses in 1867 passed for Andrew Johnson a law which, afterward being repealed, is proposed to be substituted now, in the absence of a majority in the other branch of this Congress, by the performance of a committee of this body, composed of a majority from that side on this floor, and enforcing the behests of a Republican caucus.

I will read a few lines from the acts of 1867 and 1869, and submit to any honest lawyer in or out of this Chamber whether that law now is in any form whatever to embarrass the Executive from suspending during vacation, except through such obstruction as the arbitrary will of a majority on this floor may interpose. The second section of the act of 1867 provided:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid—

That is appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer, they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended.

The act of 1867 provided—and in its absence there was no such law, there had been no such law in the history of the Government touching either suspensions or removals—that the President might suspend officers who were guilty of misconduct in office. That provision by the act of 1869 was repealed. The act of 1867 provided that the President might suspend persons who were guilty of crime, and that provision was repealed. "Or who for any reason might become incapable or legally disqualified to perform their duties," and that provision was repealed. The act of 1867 provided that the President should send his nominations to take the place of the suspended officer to the Senate within twenty days after its next session began, and that provision was repealed and substituted by one making it thirty days. But mark you this, the act of 1867 provided that the President should send the reasons for which he had made the suspension and the evidence of those reasons, and that provision was repealed.

Now let me ask any candid-minded Senator what is the proposition before us but to require the heads of Departments and the chief executive officers to send us the reasons which actuated the President in making a suspension, or the evidence which supplies the reasons, and thus a practical re-enactment by the Senate of a law which both Houses of Congress once enacted and since repealed? What else can you make of it?

But it is said these officers are suspended by the President until the end of the next session of the Senate; we are therefore called upon to act on the question of the removal of these parties.

Sir, the language of the act of 1869 forever precludes any such construction. Under the act of 1867 when the President sent a nomination to the Senate, if the Senate failed to concur in that nomination the suspended officer immediately resumed the functions of his office. That act undoubtedly required action by the Senate with reference to the suspension or removal. Under the act of 1869 the President sends the nomination to the Senate. The Senate can not act on the question of suspension. It is especially precluded by the act from doing so, because instead of the question of advising and consenting to the removal or to the suspension being submitted, the act provides that if a nomination sent to the Senate be not confirmed the President shall as soon thereafter as practicable send in another.

Why send a nomination to the Senate when the Senate has already acted on the ground that the Senate is opposed to the removal of the incumbent? If the act contemplated that the Senate should act on that removal, why not have provided, as intelligent men must have provided, that if the Senate failed to assent to the nomination the suspended officer should forthwith resume his functions? Discretion is given by the statute. It is not to make the Senate Chamber a graveyard for character and have one man whose name comes in defeated because the Senate does not want the suspended officer removed. If the man put in his place is not confirmed, another name comes from the President, and still another, and still another. The Senate all the time goes through the idle process of referring nominations to a committee, inquiring into the propriety of the nomination, having determined in the first instance that the suspension ought not to be made, and receiving one after another of the nominations the President sends here without an inquiry into their fitness and determined in advance to defeat them.

I submit that no candid-minded lawyer can read those two acts without the clear conviction that the act of 1869 was intended to be precisely what Mr. Blaine declares it to have been, a practical repeal of the act of 1867. The President suspends an officer until the end of the next session of the Senate; he makes a nomination to succeed him; you approve or disapprove it. You may put it on the ground that you reject his proposition to suspend the officer. You are estopped to raise that question. That man is suspended until the end of the next session of the Senate. The moment it ends, what matter to you or me whether by operation of law the suspended officer gets back or not?

By an act of the President, his mere signature, he gets out again. Adhere to the form if you will, but the law puts in the hands of the President, independent of the constitutional question, the absolute and arbitrary power to suspend a public officer; and yet we are met by the proposition that in all these matters the President must submit without law to every degradation, to every humiliation, to every demand by the Senate which is made under a law which has been denounced by its own friends and supporters as the result of the feverish excitement of the time when it was enacted and which has been "practically repealed."

I had intended to read a few extracts from some of the arguments made in 1869 when the law was modified.

The report of the Committee on the Judiciary here says that the President of the United States, notwithstanding his civil service sentiments, sent to the Senate within thirty days after its meeting six hundred and forty-three suspensions. It would have been at least fair if the committee had stated that these six hundred and forty-three suspensions covered a period of eight months, as they did. The law required the President to send to the Senate within thirty days of its meeting the nominations to succeed every officer suspended by him during the previous recess, and that number amounted to six hundred and forty-three as reported by the committee. But in 1869, when General Grant assumed the functions of the executive office, he sent to the Senate six hundred and eighty removals within seven weeks, and during six weeks of those seven the original act of 1867 was still in force. That is so, as shown by the files of the Senate.

In eight months President Cleveland sent in six hundred and forty-three, while in seven weeks, and for six weeks of those seven the tenure-of-office act of 1867 was in force, President Grant sent to the Senate six hundred and eighty removals, of which he withdrew in a short time ninety-seven, leaving five hundred and eighty three, and they did not come fast enough! The popular demand to carry out the policy indicated by Mr. Blaine's chapter which I read to the Senate was so great, it was so strong, that a gentleman now a member of the Senate and at that time a member of the House offered an amendment which I want as a matter of historical interest to read to the Senate. Bear in mind that the act was pending which was passed and which made the modification of the act of 1867 under which we are living and acting to-day.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], a Senator whom we all respect for his open and manly methods of dealing with all questions, recognizing the popular haste of his party, forgetting doubtless for the time being any question of Constitution, of statute, or anything else save the pressure which impelled him, offered the following amendment:

Provided, That all civil offices, except those of judges of the United States courts, that were filled by appointment by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, before the 4th of March, 1869, shall become vacant on the 30th day of June, 1869.

Every civil officer in the United States, except judges who hold by constitutional tenure, was to be stricken down in a day by this amendment. President Grant was to be overwhelmed in an hour by the fact that one hundred thousand offices, whose incumbents were called upon to help in administering the affairs of this great Republic, were vacant. And still we hear through the solemn formality of a report of a committee of the Senate a loud protestation against the removal of six hundred and seventy-three Republicans by a Democratic President in eight months!

In the course of the debate in 1869 Mr. Morton made some observations which I believe are worthy of attention at this moment. He said:

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. I do not intend to go into the argument of the law on this question. I take it that there are some questions of constitutional law that can be settled by time, and especially by contemporaneous exposition. After the Constitution was formed came the First Congress. That Congress was largely composed of the men who framed the Constitution; and that Congress passed upon this very question. That Congress found this power to reside with the President; and that construction was acquiesced in for seventy-eight years; and yet we are now told that there is nothing settled. Now, we have technical constructions of the Constitution resorted to to overturn the contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution that was acquiesced in for seventy-eight years. I have heard no argument made here that I can regard as otherwise than technical, that I can regard as otherwise than far-fetched; and when we consider that it is technical, and when we consider that the very men who made the Constitution decided against that construction, and the country acquiesced in that decision for three-quarters of a century, it is too late to come forward with a n acute and subtile and technical construction of the Constitution.

In another part of his discourse Mr. Morton said:

I believe it is a true principle, and that political parties can only be managed successfully upon the principle, that where the party in power have the right to remove those who are opposed to them in principle and to place in power those who are equally good and honest but agree with them in political principles, that power shall be exercised. I think that, other things being equal, it is right to make such changes. I believe that it is proper that the Executive of this nation should have his subordinate officers in harmony with himself in political opinion. Not only his Cabinet, but those in responsible positions, other things being equal, should be men who agree with him in his general line of policy.

Then, speaking of the act of 1867 particularly, of which he was seeking to aid the repeal, he says:

It makes the President a common informer. That is the character in which it places him, that of a common informer, to inform the Senate in regard to the delinquencies, the inefficiency, or the corruption of an officer, and the Senate is then to proceed to the trial. It puts him in a position that is not honorable to his high character, and one in which he should never be placed.

I desire to read simply in passing the following observations of Mr. Morton also:

Therefore, sir, all these constitutional arguments denying to the President the power of removal, and insisting that that power is vested by the Constitution in the Senate and President jointly, are of no more importance than a mere display of Chinese fireworks in the presence of a real battle.

Now I desire to read a few extracts from a speech made by Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, who was in Congress in 1867, when that act was passed, and also in Congress in 1869, when the act of 1867 was modified. Speaking of the proposition to suspend the act of 1867, Mr. SHERMAN said:

Why, sir, if it ought to be suspended for one year it ought to be repealed. If there is any object whatever for this law to accomplish it ought to exist during the next recess of the Senate. The whole power is to be transferred to General Grant for one year. He may remove any one for any cause whatever; and then, after everybody that is in is turned out, the doors must be shut on all future Presidents, all future administrations. Is that what the Judiciary Committee mean? Suppose that at the end of four years the people of the United States, the common masters of us all, should change their mind, and General Grant's administration should not meet their approval, and some other administration should come in, would you then deny to the new administration a power which you concede to General Grant for one year? Why, sir, the public voice and the public judgment would denounce that as partisan legislation, and all the power, all the authority of the great Republican party could not defend and maintain such a doctrine.

That is precisely the doctrine which the Senator himself is undertaking to defend. The Senator from Ohio said further:

If this act is repealed removals may be made without the consent of the Senate, and the only question the Senate will act upon in that case will be the question of the confirmation of the new appointee.

Speaking of the act which was in force at that time, and of the necessity that the President should furnish personal information touching removals and appointments, the Senator from Ohio said:

But if you ask me whether the incumbent is guilty or not guilty under the tenure-of-office act, I can not answer without a knowledge of details only known to executive officers charged with public trusts. They are the proper persons to judge of removals and the cause of removals; we are the proper persons to judge of the standing and character of persons appointed to office.

Speaking of the enforcement of the tenure-of-office act, the Senator from Ohio said:

Now, in my judgment it can not, with due regard to the public interests, be practically enforced. What has been our experience within two years in the revenue service? After we adjourned two years ago many cases of fraud arose in that service. What was the result? When we came back here we were met with piles of documents which the President of the United States sent to us; various papers showing that certain officers of the Government had performed acts which in his judgment amounted to misdemeanor, crime, &c., and for which they were suspended. He gave us specific facts and evidence. These cases were referred to the appropriate committees. What were we called upon to examine? We had to take up and carefully read piles of papers and examine each particular case like a chancellor or a judge of assize. Every suspended officer contended that he was the most innocent man born since the time of Adam—

And they do yet—

He demanded a trial and copies of charges and proof and a formal hearing before the committees of this body, he converting us into a court and jury to try his particular case. If we could not try him, why demand charges and evidence? If the tenure-of-office act was right in principle, we were bound to examine each case to see whether or not the accused officer was, according to the language of the law, guilty of misconduct in office or crime, or had become incapable or legally disqualified. The result was that some of the committees of this body could not transact their business.

That is precisely the attitude in which we are sought to be placed now:

These cases were referred, and after great delay were reported upon. In one case the accused was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary while we were deliberating whether he was properly suspended or not.

If Senators do not move a little more rapidly than heretofore, history may repeat itself in more than one instance.

Mr. LOGAN. It has already.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator from Illinois suggests that it has already repeated itself. I have no doubt that it will often do so. But what does that mean, except that the effort to get rid of the act of 1867 was because of the necessity of freeing the Senate from precisely the conditions into which we are to be thrown by this universal demand for papers in every case of suspension? There is no law; the law was repealed; but the will of the committee or of a majority is to be substituted for law, and in every case we are told by the resolutions on the Clerk's desk in which the papers failed to come the Senate is to refuse its affirmance of a nomination.

I presume if the resolution means anything it means the assertion of a principle. If the resolutions involve necessarily, as they must be intended to involve, the principle that the Senate can not with dignity and self-respect act upon suspensions except upon the communication of these papers by the Executive, then it can not act upon them in any instance, no matter from what source the information comes, as long as the Executive declines. Had not the Senate as well resolve itself into a hostile attitude, lash itself into a fury, and declare that if somebody somewhere does not furnish us information on certain topics it will not pass any law, as to say that unless the President sends information from the Departments here touching suspensions it will not make any confirmations?

No, Mr. President, without law, by the act of a mere majority here, if that majority shall be led to indorse the action of the committee, and in violation of both Constitution and law, the present Executive is sought to be placed in the attitude in which Mr. Morton denounced the act of 1867 as placing the Executive then, that of a common informer. He suspends a citizen from office and nominates another. The Senate sends to him to procure the papers touching the suspension.

The action of the majority here is not as fair to the Executive even as the law of 1867, because under the law of 1867 the President at least knew that when he made his case for a suspension he made his whole case and would be judged by it. Now, I may go to him, any gentleman may go to him, and hand him a wagon-load of papers. He may wade through them from one end to the other, he may discard them, send them to the Treasury, send them to the Post-Office Department, to the War or Navy Department, or put them in his own closet as utterly unworthy of consideration, and the next day you, sir, may go and upon your assurance as an individual Senator he may make a suspension. The Senate comes along and asks him for papers. He sends those papers down here, and that case goes to the appropriate committee, to the Senate, and to the country as one involving action upon evidence which was not even considered.

Then what? The committee in making its report brings with it the report made in the House in 1842, and brings it approvingly. Let me call your attention to it, and through it to the attitude in which the committee would place the Senate. Let us look at the report which is brought in here approvingly by the Committee on the Judiciary. The report states:

Mr. Sylvester having been removed by Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, your committee thought it was proper to notify him of their proceedings, and therefore directed its chairman to inform him of the readiness of the committee to receive any communication which he might desire to make to it, to summon and take the testimony of any witnesses he might wish to have examined, and to invite him to attend its meetings. In reply, the honorable Secretary informed the chairman that he did "not desire to make any communication to the committee, or to have any witnesses summoned by it, or to attend its meetings."

There is where this report would place the present Executive. He is asked to furnish to the Senate papers touching a suspension from office. He knows, and the head of the Department that sends them here knows, that those papers contain no fact upon which the Executive has acted. They well know that the administration must be misrepresented here, that it must be misunderstood here, and misunderstood by the entire country, or else the Executive must follow those papers into the recesses of your committee-room, bringing, as that committee suggested to Mr. Spencer, such witnesses as they wanted to examine, and there create what the Senator from Ohio denounces as courts of assize in every committee-room of the Senate. The misfortune would be that in every single instance of the forty or fifty committees to consider these nominations the court would be composed of eight to seven!

"Where is the President of the United States?" asks the American citizen when he treads these streets. Over before the Committee on the Judiciary prosecuting John Jones to get him out of office as marshal. "Where is the Secretary of the Treasury?" Over before the Committee on Finance, with his subordinates and witnesses, making a police court of that committee to establish a reasonable cause for the suspension of Bill Wright as collector in West Virginia. "Where is the Postmaster-General?" asks the American citizen as he walks these streets. Echo answers where, as my friend [Mr. VOORHEES] suggests. Over before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate, trying to prove by witnesses he has summoned that Sam Johnson, who was postmaster at some place in the United States, ought to be removed for larceny or some other sort of rascality, for drunkenness, or even because he is perverting the position he holds and antagonizing the administration under which he holds it. So would the committee by the resolution prostitute every feature of the executive department of this Government into mere prosecutors and informers, to be called upon, examined, held here or sent back to the discharge of their appropriate functions at the pleasure of the Senate. Mr. President, that will not do! That will not do!

When President Cleveland assumed the functions of the office of Chief Executive of this Government I do not believe there is a citizen in the land who had any reason whatever to doubt or did doubt that he came to the discharge of the duties of that office determined, as far as in him lay, to devote conservative patriotic application to the discharge of his obligations. I believe I speak within bounds when I say that this whole country knew that the one great idea of service to the country in an acceptable manner in the high capacity in which it had selected him for that service was his first, his only aspiration. I would fail to express my own candid conviction now if I did not say that looking back over the long line of predecessors in that office, and confronting as he may the issues presented here, he will be the last to be first in surrendering its high prerogatives. The Senate may continue, as his message indicates, to ply him and his various subordinate Departments with harassing and embarrassing applications and issues. It may defeat every nomination that stands before it for consideration. It may assert, arbitrarily or otherwise, its forms of assault upon every prerogative granted by the Constitution of the country. But I mistake that man if he does not stand firmly to his post, maintaining, as it is his sworn duty under the Constitution of his country to maintain, every prerogative of his high office, and transmit it unimpaired to his successors. Like Alpine's oak on Alpine peak amid Alpine storm, "The stronger she blows the firmer she roots him!"

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. It is so late in the day that I suppose my colleague will not desire to proceed this afternoon, and therefore I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague for the purpose indicated?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield, if it is understood that I shall have the floor to proceed on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will have the floor on Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. JOSEPH MCKENNA, of California; Mr. J. THOMAS SPRIGGS, of New York; Mr. J. A. LOUTTIT, of California; Mr. J. B. MORGAN, of Mississippi; Mr. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN, of Iowa; Mr. POLK LAFFOON, of Kentucky, and Mr. SETH L. MILLIKEN, of Maine, the committee on the part of the House to accompany a similar committee on the part of the Senate to escort the remains of the late Senator JOHN F. MILLER from Washington to California.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, March 9, 1886.

George W. Morse, to be postmaster at Waterbury, in the county of Washington and State of Vermont.

Frank T. Spinney, to be postmaster at Medford, in the county of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts.

William D. McMaster, to be postmaster at Woodstock, in the county of Windsor and State of Vermont.

James T. Blain, to be postmaster at Brunswick, Glynn County, Georgia.

Mary Houston Gillespie, to be postmaster at Aberdeen, Monroe County, Mississippi.

Edward H. Lucas, to be postmaster at Florence, Darlington County, South Carolina.

William J. Wallace, to be postmaster at Norwood, Norfolk County, Massachusetts.

Edward P. King, to be postmaster at Hawkinsville, Pulaski County, Georgia.

Thomas Ingalls, to be postmaster at Marblehead, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts.

Henry L. Kenyon, to be postmaster at Northfield, in the county of Washington and State of Vermont.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House resolutions of the Senate, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 11, 1886.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from California.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MILLER, and that as a mark of respect entertained by the Senate for his memory, his remains be removed from Washington to California in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate the foregoing resolutions to the House of Representatives.

C. C. ANDREWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State and recommending an appropriation to reimburse C. C. Andrews, late consul at Rio Janeiro, for extra clerk-hire; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE EXPENSES OF MONTANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an additional estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for legislative expenses of Montana Territory for the present fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES E. BEHLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and recommending an appropriation to reimburse Charles E. Behle, special examiner, Pension Office, for loss incurred while on duty; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONS ON REVENUE COLLECTIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue, recommending the repeal of the provision of section 3314 of the Revised Statutes allowing commissions on collections to collectors of internal revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DOCKERY. On yesterday the Secretary of War transmitted a letter to the House in reference to the encroachments of the Missouri River upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was designed for the use of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the Secretary's communication, and that it be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DENTON & SAGE.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3039) to refund to Denton & Sage, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $1,549.67, duties paid on sixty hogsheads of sugar.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $1,549.67 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the repayment to Messrs. Denton & Sage, commission merchants, of the city of Chicago, of certain custom dues paid by them on 60 hogsheads of sugar, which were destroyed by fire, before delivery to them, in the great fire in Chicago, October 8 and 9, 1871.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay such sum to Messrs. Denton & Sage upon the execution by them of a proper receipt therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIRECT TAX UNDER ACT OF 1861.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution of inquiry which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish to the House a statement of the account, as it appears from the books of the Treasury, between the United States and the several States and Territories, of the direct tax laid and apportioned to the States and Territories by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, with the balances due from or unpaid by any State or Territory to the United States, and a detailed statement of the assessment and collection of any portion of said tax in any State or Territory. Also the statement of any set-off of claims due to the States and Territories and applied on such tax, together with such information as shall show the condition of accounts.

Mr. BLAND. Has that resolution been before any committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. BLAND. I object to the present consideration of the resolution. Let it be referred.

Mr. CASWELL. I will state that the Secretary of State has carefully prepared this information, but there has been no request from the House that he should furnish it. At his suggestion I prepared the resolution that the information might come through that channel, through which he desires it to come. I think there can be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] objects.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the proper committee. It will come back within a few days.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution, and it is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, communicated to the House a resolution of the Senate inviting the House of Representatives to attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California, in the Senate Chamber on Saturday, March 13, at 12 o'clock m.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR JOHN F. MILLER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a resolution of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary invite the House of Representatives to attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California, in the Senate Chamber, on Saturday, March 13, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. MORROW. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk in relation to the subject-matter of the Senate resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House accept the invitation of the Senate, and attend in a body the funeral services of the late Senator JOHN F. MILLER, of California, in the Senate Chamber, on Saturday, March 13, at 12 o'clock m.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP OZAMA.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 5219, to provide for an American register for the steamship Ozama, of New York city, and that the same be taken up for present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Ozama, owned at the port of New York, by William P. Clyde, an American citizen, and rebuilt by him at Wilmington, Del., to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam-vessel, steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied on the inspection of said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances will be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save that the fact that said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report upon that bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed.

Mr. DINGLEY. This bill has been unanimously reported from the commitee.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that the bill is wrong in any respect; but I think the report should be read.

Mr. FELTON. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is the call for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; it is not.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

The morning hour for the presentation of reports of committees now begins. This being Friday, reports of a private nature are in order. Before proceeding with that order the Chair will present certain personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BENNETT, by unanimous consent, was given indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness.

Mr. HEWITT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. HIESTAND, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for four days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, the objection to the present consideration of House bill No. 5219 is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the call for the regular order is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE] and the demand for the regular order being withdrawn, if there be no further objection the bill is before the House for present consideration.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LORE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. By instruction of the Committee on Commerce, I move that House bill No. 902 be made a special order for Tuesday, April 13, and that the consideration of it be continued from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, asks unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 13th day of April, be set apart for the consideration of the bill indicated by him (which the Chair understands is the interstate-commerce bill), and that the consideration of it be continued from day to day thereafter until completed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman understands, I suppose, that this is the unanimous request of the Committee on Commerce?

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks made yesterday on the Indian appropriation bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, asked unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for information, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The resolution was read.

Mr. SPRINGER objected, and the resolution was not received.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed with the regular order, which is the call of the committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. DUNN]. This completes the call of the standing and select committees of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

IDA A. RICHARDSON AND OTHERS.

The first business on the Private Calendar, coming over as unfinished business from the last session of the committee, was the bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida S. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson and Caroline Augusta Urquhart.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LYMAN. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has thirty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. LYMAN resumed and concluded the remarks begun by him on March 5. [See pages 2120–2123.]

[Before Mr. LYMAN had completed the above remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I can be recognized in my own right, I will yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], a member of the committee, is next entitled to the floor in his own right, and has forty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be allowed an extension of time to complete his remarks. I do not desire to give him my time.

Mr. LYMAN. I desire less than five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LYMAN resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Whenever a claim is presented against this Government that I think ought not to be paid I shall oppose it by my voice and vote. Whenever a claim is presented that in my judgment ought to be paid, the fear that it will open the door to an abuse will not deter me from giving it my support. I believe that this Congress will always be strong enough to close the door tight against spoliation and fraud whenever it ought to be closed.

This money, Mr. Chairman, for which this claim is made was not seized to sustain the Army. It was not taken as a war measure. It was money collected upon an insurance policy upon real estate. It is not for property that was destroyed by our armies because such destruction was deemed necessary, because such property undestroyed might be used for the benefit of the rebellion. This bill is to refund money which was collected by the officers of the United States and turned into the public Treasury.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] has called the attention of the committee to the numerous statutes passed by Congress under which this property could be condemned. Yet twenty-four years have elapsed and no proceedings to condemn have ever been instituted. I believe it can be demonstrated that these claimants are legally entitled to this money. Ought not, then, the Government during the period of twenty-four years to have instituted its proceeding in a court, in which the parties to this controversy might be brought before the court and these questions adjudicated upon and the question determined whether this money ought to be confiscated or not?

But, sir, I am not going to discuss this question upon that narrow ground. At the time when these claimants left the city of New Orleans General Butler was in command at that place. He went there with full power from the General Government for the government of that city and for adopting such measures as he believed necessary and proper for the development of the sentiment of loyalty in the State of Louisiana, for the bringing back of that State into the Union. He went there with full power as the minister, the representative, of this Government. This city was in his possession. He was the governor and ruler of it. Possessed of all these powers, clothed with them by the General Government, he saw fit to address to these claimants this letter:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, June 23, 1862.

MESDAMES: I have the pleasure to inform you that my necessities, which caused the request for permission to use your house during your absence this summer, have been relieved. I have taken the house of General Twiggs, late of the United States Army, for quarters. Inclined never on slight causes to use the power intrusted to me to grieve even sentiments only entitled to respect, from the courage and ladylike propriety of manner in which they were avowed, it is gratifying to be enabled to yield to the appeal you made for favor and protection by the United States.

Yours shall be the solitary exception to the general rule adopted that they who ask protection must take upon themselves corresponding obligations, or do an equal favor to the Government. I have an aged mother at home who, like you, might request the inviolability of hearth-stone and roof-tree from the presence of a stranger. For her sake you shall have the pass you ask, which is sent herewith.

As I did myself the honor to say personally, you may leave the city with no fear that your house will be interfered with by any exercise of military right, but will be safe under the laws of the United States. Trusting that the inexorable logic of events will convict you of wrong toward your country when all else has failed,

I remain, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major-General.

Mesdames SLOCOMB and URQUHART.

General Butler wrote that letter and delivered it to these claimants not privately, but publicly. For some good reason he, the military governor of the city of New Orleans, gave them this letter, and the question presented here to-day is whether the Government of the United States will repudiate the governor it sent to the State of Louisiana in those trying times. What political policy underlay this I do not know. I know this act was done publicly by him. He gave to these women this letter, and said to them, "You may leave this city and your property shall not be disturbed by the Federal Army."

I, sir, for one, intend to respect that official act of General Butler, and in voting to respect it I shall find no precedent against my voting, whenever I deem it my duty, against any other claims that may be presented here.

Let us look a little further on and see how General Butler himself——

Mr. LYMAN. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. LYMAN. Does that letter refer to this lady's property generally or only to her residence?

Mr. HISCOCK. That question is best answered by another letter from General Butler, which I shall read:

MADAM: For anything I have done in getting the restoration of your property I neither require nor desire thanks. When you left New Orleans, I pledged my faith, and I supposed the faith of the Government, that your property should not be disturbed.

I put upon the letter the construction General Butler himself puts upon it in his letter of September, 1865.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Had General Butler any such authority?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am asked if General Butler had any authority! I answer that he was there with life and death in his hands. He was the military governor of New Orleans, martial law prevailed, and he was ruling the city as its military governor, the civil law being suspended.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But he was not above giving reasons for his acts.

Mr. HISCOCK. My friend says that General Butler was not above giving reasons for his acts. Perhaps he was not. He is not here to be catechised upon that point. We all know how his acts there in many respects were criticised. I remember it; the gentleman remembers it; and for reasons—political, I doubt not—General Butler deemed it wise to give this letter to these ladies. I have read you in part what he thought about the repudiation of that letter by the military authorities after he had left the city.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask him a question in order to make my meaning plain. I wish to ask him whether the correspondence here indicates that General Butler gave this safeguard in consideration of some private or of some public service that had been rendered by these parties?

Mr. HISCOCK. I can not answer the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is a very important question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know. It is enough for me that he gave the letter, and gave it openly and publicly, and that it was advertised throughout the country. General Butler gave this letter, making this case, as he himself stated, a single, solitary, exceptional instance, pledging to these ladies, as he afterward said, that their property should be protected and their rights respected. I will read again this letter of September 25, 1865. General Butler thus writes to Mrs. Slocomb:

MADAM: For anything that I have done in getting the restoration of your property I neither desire nor require thanks. When you left New Orleans, I pledged my faith, and I supposed the faith of the Government, that your property should not be disturbed. By acts on the part of those in authority thereafter, for which there can be no palliation except ignorance of the fact or of their duty, that pledge was not observed. To restore my faith as far as possible I aided in procuring the restoration of the property. I could do no less in honor. A sense of this has prevented my replying to the kind notes of thanks from Mrs. Urquhart.

That is the construction put upon his own letter by General Butler. He was regarded by the Government of the United States as the best man to put in command in New Orleans at that time. We of the North were satisfied with his administration of the civil government there; and for one, I propose, by my vote and my voice, to stand by the measures which he saw fit to adopt.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit a question in this connection?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does not the letter of General Butler which he gave to these ladies apply distinctly to the protection of their house and nothing else?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that, I can only say that I do not so understand the letter.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Read it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have read it, and it speaks for itself. I do not so understand it, and General Butler did not so understand it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He says so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman still says that General Butler says thus and so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Read it for yourself.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have read it, and it has been read to the House, and I do not so understand it. The gentleman must not ask me a question and expect that I will answer it as he wishes if I do not so understand the case.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman read the letter again?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have read it to this committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will read it if the gentleman will permit. My question is entirely a fair one. I ask the gentleman whether General Butler does not say in that letter: "As I did myself the honor to say personally, you may leave the city with no fear that your house will be interfered with by any exercise of military right," &c.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, a part of this claim, I understand, is for the insurance money collected on account of the destruction of that house by fire.

Mr. LYMAN. No; that was other property. There is no claim of that kind about the house.

Mr. CANNON. Was the property that was destroyed in the dwelling-house?

Mr. LYMAN. No; it was a store-room that was burned.

Mr. HISCOCK. How near the house?

Mr. LYMAN. I do not know.

Mr. HISCOCK. Connected with it, I suppose?

Mr. LYMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The intention certainly was not to protect only one particular piece of property.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then, Mr. Chairman, the opposition is put upon this narrow ground, that simply the house of these ladies was to be protected. I do not so understand the letter. It is unnecessary for me to read it again. We have here General Butler's own construction of that letter. He believed he gave these ladies a pledge that their property should be protected, and that they should have the benefit of it. Now I will answer the question of the gentleman from Maine. What would these people naturally expect? They left the city of New Orleans holding this letter of General Butler, who was in command of the city; they went away from the city with his knowledge and consent under the pledge contained in this letter. What did they understand? What did they have a right to understand was the effect of that pledge?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should suppose they would understand that the letter meant just what it said.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go a little further into this report. I will read another letter from General Butler:

At your request, as attorney for Mrs. Slocomb and Mrs. Urquhart, I gave you a statement of the facts in regard to the matter as far as I have any knowledge. When I came to New Orleans I learned that Mrs. Slocomb, while a fast friend of the confederate cause, while her son was serving in the confederate army, yet had manifested her sense of right and justice by refusing to allow the debts which she owed her Northern creditors to be confiscated, and, resisting that very extraordinary and unjust enactment of the confederate congress, had paid and had made arrangements to pay her debts.

I do not know, sir, but in this action on the part of this lady General Butler found a justification for this letter which he gave her. A high-toned lady, owing debts in the North, she had refused to take advantage of that act of confiscation; ay, more, had refused to allow those debts to be confiscated and had paid her Northern creditors. It speaks well for her. Possibly that was the reason which urged the commanding general to give her this letter. Doubtless there were sufficient circumstances justifying him in what he did, otherwise he would not have given her that letter—circumstances doing credit to her honor and to his sense of justice and of the proprieties of statesmanship.

Let us go on a little further in this case. I read a part of the report:

As long as General Butler remained in command the pledge given by him was strictly observed; but General Butler was shortly thereafter succeeded by General Banks, and about August 1, 1862, a general order was issued by the latter under which all the real estate owned by the claimants was taken possession of by his quartermaster. It is believed that General Banks was ignorant of the pledge given by his predecessor. A portion of said property was used for various military purposes, and the residue was turned over to B. F. Flanders, the supervising special agent of the Treasury in that city; the rents thereof were collected by him, and were duly accounted for to the Treasury Department.

* * * * * * *

On being informed of these facts Mrs. Slocomb made repeated applications for permission to return to New Orleans for the purpose of taking possession of her property.

Mr. LYMAN. The only application about which there is a hint in the entire case was late in 1864, when some friend of hers wrote a letter to General Banks asking that she might return; and he, after investigation through the provost-marshal and other officers, refused to allow her to return—for good reasons, I presume.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the only response that I can make to the assertion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] is that the report from which I have just read was presented to the Senate by Senator MANDERSON; and I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], when upon the floor the other day, to indorse this report.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I desire to yield further time to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. How much?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not ask for more than five minutes.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senate Committee on War Claims made this report to the Senate and the gentleman from Illinois reported it to the last House:

On being informed of these facts Mrs. Slocomb made repeated applications for permission to return to New Orleans, but permission was refused, and all the parties remained at their country seat until the close of the war, without in any manner participating therein.

If she had returned to New Orleans and taken possession of her property it would not have been confiscated.

Mr. LYMAN. She did not attempt to return to New Orleans until late in 1864. She left the city in 1862.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can only say again, in response to the gentleman, that I find here in the report this statement of facts——

Mr. LYMAN. I have investigated, and I know.

Mr. HISCOCK. I find it stated in this report that upon learning her property had been seized she immediately sought to return to New Orleans; that she made frequent applications to be allowed to do so; that her applications were refused, and that she remained at her country seat, taking no part in the war.

Mr. LYMAN. There is no evidence where she was.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman says there is no evidence. I know that this is a report made by a Senate committee, presented to that body, I believe, by a gallant Union soldier, a gentleman in whose judgment I have great confidence; and I do not believe he has any sympathies which would lead him to favor the payment of claims which ought not to be paid. And as I said a moment ago I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] to indorse this report and this statement of fact.

We have, then, these claimants leaving the city, relying upon this letter of General Butler, upon which he has put a construction; we find this property taken during their absence—the property of this woman, who had insisted on paying her Northern creditors; and we find her, on learning of the seizure of her property, endeavoring to return to the city of New Orleans, her property having been seized in violation of a pledge which had been given by the military governor sent by the United States to that city. In the fact that such a pledge ought to be redeemed I find sufficient reason for voting to pay back this money to these claimants. The redemption of this pledge of General Butler is a sufficient reason in my view for my vote, and I have no fear, as the gentleman from Iowa seems to have, that this vote will stand in my way as a precedent to prevent me from voting against the payment of claims which ought not to be paid.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I find myself physically unable by reason of the contraction of a severe cold to argue this case in extenso, as I had hoped to be able to do.

The petition of these claimants, all of whom are ladies, and were during the war non-combatants, was first presented to the Forty-third Congress. It was reported favorably by the War Claims Committee of the House. No action was taken on it during that Congress because the bill was not reached in its regular order on the Calender. Again, in the Forty-fourth Congress, this bill received the unanimous favorable action of the House Committee on War Claims. It was not considered by the House because, like in the previous Congress, not reached on the Calendar. In the Forty-fifth Congress the War Claims Committee again reported the bill favorably without a dissenting voice; and during the second session of that Congress it came up for action in the House, and was passed by the House. It was not acted on by the Senate because not reached on the Senate Calendar. Bills for the relief of claimants were introduced in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, but no reports from the Committee on War Claims in these Congresses appear to have been made.

In the Forty-eighth Congress the House Committee on War Claims reported the bill favorably; and the Senate Committee on War Claims did likewise, so that in that Congress it appeared with favorable reports upon the Calendars of both Houses.

In the Forty-ninth Congress this bill was again reported favorably by the Senate Committee on War Claims, and was passed by the Senate during the present session some weeks ago. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims of the House, and is here now, having at its back five favorable reports of the House Committee on War Claims and two favorable reports of the Senate Committee on War Claims. It stands here having passed both Houses of Congress—the House in the Forty-fifth Congress and the Senate during the present Congress.

In all these efforts, Mr. Chairman, to pass this bill there has been but one single dissenting voice, so far as the reports in the case show, and that is the minority report of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN]. In the Forty-eighth Congress the report made from the House Committee on War Claims was made by the gentleman from Illinois on my right [Mr. ROWELL], and in the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Now the claim upon which this bill is founded grows out of peculiar circumstances existing in 1862 in the city of New Orleans. In May, 1862, the city of New Orleans surrendered to the army of the United States commanded by General Benjamin F. Butler. In taking possession of the city of New Orleans General Butler issued a proclamation, one extract from which I will read:

That all rights of property of whatever kind will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States.

In June, 1862, about one month after the capture of the city of New Orleans, Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb, a widow lady, with her two daughters, one of them at that time unmarried and the other the wife of Col. David Urquhart, with three little children of Mrs. Urquhart, applied to General Butler for permission to do what they had done for years before, that is, to retire to a summer home which they had in North Carolina. They asked General Butler for permission to go to their country seat at Flat Rock, in the mountains of North Carolina. General Butler took the request of these ladies into consideration and the next day he had an interview with them, and wrote them a letter also in which he gave all of them the permission they asked for to pass out of his lines.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] was mistaken in referring to the record as showing that this permission did not include any one but Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb.

Mr. LYMAN. Will the gentleman from Louisiana call my attention to that pass anywhere in the record?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will before I get through.

Mr. LYMAN. Where is it?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Sir, the pass of General Butler included the three of these ladies, and their affidavits are on file in this record showing it.

The only condition General Butler exacted from these ladies was that they should not aid or abet the cause of the Confederate States during their retirement in the mountains of North Carolina. They gave that promise, and not only that, the record shows Mrs. Slocomb repaired, before leaving the city of New Orleans, to the office of the provost-marshal and there took an oath that she would not give aid or comfort to the cause of the Confederate States.

Mr. LYMAN. Will the gentleman state where that is to be found?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will, and I am sorry the gentleman from Iowa has so misunderstood and misapprehended the record that he did not see that statement in it. I do not believe he intended in any way to misconstrue the record, but he has unwittingly been led into that which has that appearance. There is here a statement, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read, of the agent of Mrs. Slocomb to the supervising special agent of the Treasury Department immediately after the seizure of the property, in which it appears Mrs. Slocomb, before leaving the city of New Orleans, went before the provost-marshal and took the oath I have referred to. It was not an oath of allegiance to the United States; that was not exacted by General Butler; but it was an oath that she, on her part, would comply with the promises made to General Butler that during her retirement to the mountains of North Carolina she would not aid or abet the cause of the confederacy.

Mr. Chairman, these ladies did retire, all three of them. They retired to their country home in North Carolina, and the record shows that fact. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] was very greatly mistaken when he said the record did not show it. The record further shows that they remained there, making repeated efforts, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was correct in that statement—making repeated efforts to return to New Orleans after the pledge given them by General Butler had been violated and their property seized. The permission to return, however, was persistently denied them by order of General Banks. They remained at their country seat in North Carolina until some time in 1864, when the evidence in the record shows they went to Mobile in order to be as near New Orleans as possible, permission to re-enter that city being denied them.

Now after General Butler gave them this pledge in 1862, during all the time he remained in command at New Orleans the pledge was faithfully observed and carried out to the letter.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Does not the gentleman base the recovery of this claim upon the pledge made by General Butler to these ladies?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The gentleman will admit by the record that the disloyalty of the claimants is shown?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will come to that——

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to ask another question following that. Will the gentleman from Louisiana inform me if General Butler ever gave any interpretation as to what he thought his pledge to them covered?

Mr. BLANCHARD. He did.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. What?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will read it presently. Just give me time.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Then I will ask this further question——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I can not yield further.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Just this question in connection with what has preceded it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me further. I will cover all the points he has in view in the progress of my remarks.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I merely wish to read an extract in General Butler's own words upon this point.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will read it if the gentleman will give me time.

During all the time General Butler remained in New Orleans the pledge which had been given was kept to the letter. It was faithfully adhered to, and it was not until August, 1863, fifteen months afterward, that the property of claimants was seized in violation, unwittingly it may have been on the part of General Banks, of the pledge which his predecessor had given. Immediately after this seizure in August, 1863, the agent, whom Mrs. Slocomb had left in charge of her property and that of her daughters when she retired from New Orleans pursuant to the pass and permit of General Butler, addressed a communication to Hon. Benjamin F. Flanders, the agent of the Treasury Department, which I now send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, August 28, 1863.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. FLANDERS,
Agent of Treasury Department:

Your petitioner in presenting his case for your consideration begs that you recognize the principles that the United States Government is equally or more desirous to protect loyal citizens than to punish disloyal ones, and that, according to the terms of the confiscation act and the proclamation of the President, the Government takes no cognizance of treasonable offenses committed prior to September 23, 1862, by persons who on that day have ceased to support the rebellion. Your petitioner respectfully represents that in the month of June, 1862, Cora A. Slocomb asked of Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler permission for herself and daughters to go to Flat Rock, N. C., there to remain during the existence of the rebellion, and asked the protection of the United States in the enjoyment of their property.

She confessed to the General that although ardently attached to the Union, and a strong supporter until the commencement of hostilities, since the participation of members of her family in the rebellion her sympathies had been enlisted with the opposers of the Government under which she had lived so long and happily. General Butler took her petition under advisement, and after several days wrote her a letter stating that he was happy to be able to yield to her appeal for favor and protection from the United States. He assured her that she should be the only exception to the general rule adopted, that those who receive the protection of the Government must take upon themselves corresponding obligations. With this assurance, and after having registered, under oath, at the office of the provost-marshal, a promise that she would give no aid to the enemies of the United States, she proceeded to Flat Rock, in the mountains of North Carolina, leaving your petitioner as agent in charge of her property and that of her daughter. Your petitioner urges that in no sense can this property be classed as "abandoned," inasmuch as the proprietors have an agent in charge, and their presence in an insurrectionary district is by special grant of the highest authority in this Department at time of their departure.

Your petitioner respectfully urges that inasmuch as Mrs. Slocomb never took the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States, a return to her allegiance was legally accomplished by her abstaining from further assisting the confederate cause according to her obligations on record at the office of the provost-marshal. Your petitioner also urges that the promise contained in General Butler's letter places her in the same attitude to the law as if she had sworn allegiance to the United States previous to her departure. Your petitioner believes that there is no pretense upon the part of the officers of the Government that either of these ladies have broken their obligation to the provost-marshal.

Your petitioner begs you to consider that the laws of the United States take cognizance of acts, not sentiments, and that treason consists only in an overt act against the Government. Your petitioner begs you to take into consideration that ladies are ruled rather by their affections than their reason, and that this peculiar attribute which God has given them should shield them from as strong censure as the sterner sex. He begs you to reflect upon the state of society consequent upon the estrangement of wives from husbands, mothers from sons, sisters from brothers, and respectfully urges that, dark as the rebellion is, such a state of society is infinitely less preferable even though men embrace a bad cause with desperate resolution. What would you have thought of Mrs. Slocomb if her son was brought to her arms from the bloody field of Shiloh, she had held up her hand in indignant abhorrence and refused to stanch his wounds, or neglecting those tender offices which only a mother can fulfill, sat down with stolid indifference, and counsel with herself whether or not she should give aid and comfort to an enemy of the United States?

Your petitioner further urges that he has the right from Mrs. Slocomb and her daughter to appropriate their incomes to the extinguishment of his, your petitioner's, indebtedness to loyal citizens of the United States, which indebtedness, in consequence of which your petitioner having dissolved from his partner and assumed the liabilities of C. A. Slocomb & Co., amounted, on the advent of General Butler's forces in New Orleans, to $278,000, which amount your petitioner, by the employment of the incomes of said Cora A. Slocomb and Ida H. Slocomb, together with sales of hardware belonging to your petitioner, has reduced to $228,000. Your petitioner deprived of the enjoyment of these incomes will be driven by the urgency of his credits into insolvency and have his property ruinously sacrificed; and your action in taking into custody the property of these ladies before a competent court has decided their property confiscated works to your petitioner irreparable injury. Your petitioner feels sure you desire to avoid such a result. Your petitioner asks that, to save him from commercial disaster and dishonor, as well as in respect to the solemn promise of a major-general of the United States—

First. That the property of Cora A. Slocomb and Ida A. Slocomb be discharged from your custody unconditionally to your petitioner.

Secondly. If you will not grant the first, he asks that he be allowed to continue the enjoyment of the incomes by furnishing good and solvent security that, when a court of competent jurisdiction shall decide the property of these ladies confiscated to the Government, he will pay to the Government all such moneys as he has collected. There is no possibility that wrong can be done to the United States in granting the latter.

Your petitioner appeals to your knowledge of the high character of these ladies as known in this community, and asserts what is not known in this community, and which his financial relations toward them only enabled him to discover, that their lives are an unceasing routine of charity and benevolence to the poor and unfortunate.

Your petitioner most solemnly declares upon the knowledge incident to a charge of their financial matters that during the rebellion in New Orleans the larger portion of their donation was to the free market and other kindred objects rather than to purposes having in direct view the overthrow of the Government.

Your petitioner, looking hopefully forward to the time when yourself and these ladies will again enjoy in this city the blessing of a great and humane government, deeply impressed with the consistency of your conduct in being first, last, and always a Union man, and confident that the United States Government does not desire vengeance upon women, submits his petition with entire faith. You will find it consistent with the duty you owe and have always so loyally paid the Government you serve to grant his prayer.

H. F. BALDWIN.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, that paper——

Mr. LYMAN. Permit me to interrupt you a moment. I want to understand what that paper is and by whom signed?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is signed by H. F. Baldwin.

Mr. LYMAN. Who is he?

Mr. BLANCHARD. He was a member of the commercial firm of C. A. Slocomb & Co., a mercantile establishment in New Orleans prior to the war.

Mr. LYMAN. What has it to do with this case?

Mr. BLANCHARD. He was the agent of Mrs. Slocomb, having charge of her property there; and this communication bears date of August 28, 1863, and is among the papers constituting the record of this case.

Mr. LYMAN. Is it verified?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is the statement of Mr. Baldwin, but not sworn to.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It is not verified.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is a document in reference to the case which comes from the archives of the War Department, and a part of the evidence in the record.

Mr. LYMAN. I understand, if I remember reading the Congressional Directory correctly, that the gentleman from Louisiana is a lawyer. I wish to ask him if, as a lawyer, he thinks this would be evidence in any court in this country?

Mr. BLANCHARD. We are not sitting here, sir, as a court, bound down by the strict rules which obtain in courts with respect to the introduction of evidence. The gentleman knows that as well as I. This is a statement which is in the record, which got into the record by reason of having been sent there from the archives of the Treasury and War Department; and it is incomprehensible that the gentleman from Iowa failed to see it there. If he had seen it he surely would not have made the statement that there was nothing in the record to show that these ladies had gone, all three of them, to the mountain region of North Carolina and remained there. Now I confront him with this statement which shows it, and I will confront him with others which show the same thing.

Mr. LYMAN. The gentleman has not answered my question. If he declines to do so, all right. My question was, whether he considers that evidence.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, even any kind of a paper, offered as evidence in a court of law and unobjected to, goes in as evidence.

Mr. LYMAN. Then you say that is evidence.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do say it is evidence.

Mr. LYMAN. That is an answer to my question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not misconstrue what I say into anything offensive to him. I relieve him of any imputation of willfully misapprehending the record or misstating it. But that he has done so through error must be apparent.

The gentleman from Iowa made the further statement that there was nothing in the record to show—so I understood him—that these ladies had made repeated efforts to return to New Orleans.

Mr. LYMAN. Now let me correct the gentleman.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hold in my hand another paper which appears in the record.

Mr. LYMAN. Before the gentleman reads that will he allow me a word?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LYMAN. I said in my remarks, or, if not, I intended to say it on these points the gentleman is referring to, that there is no evidence in the record, and I still say nothing has been shown to the contrary; there is no evidence that they took the oath of allegiance or any other oath that they would obey the laws of the United States. That paper has been read for that purpose, but I say now there is no evidence in that paper.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not yield to the gentleman from Iowa to inject a speech within mine. I say that paper is there legitimately. It comes from the files of the War or Treasury Department. It is there without objection. The statement was made in August, 1863, at a time not suspicious, and was made by the agents of these ladies. It recites that Mrs. Slocomb went to the provost-marshal's office in New Orleans and subscribed to the oath referred to. If this was not true would it not have been an easy matter for Mr. Flanders, the agent of the Treasury Department, to whom the communication is addressed, to have gone to the office of the provost-marshal in New Orleans and discovered the falsity?

Mr. LYMAN. Would it not have been as easy for them to have taken steps to verify it?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a paper dated New Orleans, January 12, 1864, addressed to Brigadier-General Bowen, provost-mashal-general of Louisiana.

It is as follows:

DEAR SIR: Permit me to ask of you a permit in the name of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and daughter, Miss Ida A. Slocomb, now residing at Flat Rock, North Carolina, to pass the lines and return to their homes in this city.

The ladies left this city in June, 1862, under a special permit from Major-General Butler, and now desire to return to their homes.

A compliance with the above will greatly oblige.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN B. PECK.

No. 4 Canal street.

Mr. KLEINER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The date is January 12, 1864; that is another paper in the record which comes there from the archives of the Government.

Mr. LYMAN. May I ask who Mr. Peck is?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Peck was the agent of these ladies, who succeeded Mr. Baldwin in that capacity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand another letter, dated March 3, 1864. It is signed by Dr. Monro Mackie, who was a reputable physician in the city of New Orleans. It is addressed to Maj. Gen. N. P. Banks. I will not read it all, but will read an extract which I have marked:

These ladies—

Not one of them, but all three of them—

applied to General Butler and obtained from him permission to go, together with a written permission to protect their property until their return.

Properly appreciating the generous conduct of General Butler, they have lived during their absence in retirement at their country seat among the hills of North Carolina, and have religiously abstained from any act or expression which might release the Government from the pledge given to them by its agent.

That is another paper, Mr. Chairman, which I found legitimately in the record when I obtained the papers constituting the record from the gentleman from Iowa himself.

Mr. LYMAN. Of course the gentleman claims that that too is evidence.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do claim it is evidence. Now I hold in my hand four affidavits. The gentleman from Iowa has objected to the statements already cited, because they were not attested by the oath of the parties. I hold four affidavits showing the same state of facts, namely: that the permission given by General Butler included all three of these ladies; that they all three retired to Flat Rock, North Carolina, and there remained; and that they made repeated efforts to return to New Orleans, but without avail. I need not read all of them, but I will read a portion of one of the affidavits, which shows what I desire to establish in this connection. The paper from which I now read was a petition addressed to the Forty-third Congress, and is attested by the oath of the party. I hope the gentleman from Iowa considers it evidence. I am only reading one extract from it:

Your memorialist further avers that application was several times made by friends in her behalf—

This is the statement of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb—for permission for her to return to New Orleans. But this permission was refused, and she and her daughters continued to reside in their mountain home, taking no part in the struggle that was raging around them.

This is attested by the oath of Mrs. Slocomb. Here is a similar statement under oath from Mrs. Caroline Augusta Urquhart, one of the ladies included in the permit of General Butler. Here is another affidavit to the same effect from Miss Ida A. Slocomb, now Mrs. Richardson. Lastly, I hold in my hand an affidavit of Dr. Monro Mackie, not the paper from which I read just now, but an affidavit, in which he reiterates the statement that these ladies retired from New Orleans upon the permit of General Butler, and remained at their country home during the whole period, without in any manner aiding or abetting the confederate cause, thereby complying with their promise to General Butler, and that they made repeated efforts to return to New Orleans, but without avail. No one can object that these affidavits do not constitute evidence.

Mr. Chairman, the property belonging to these ladies seized by General Banks in 1863, fifteen months after they left the city pursuant to the permit of General Butler, amounted in value, in the aggregate, to nearly $500,000.

To be exact, I hold in my hand the inventory, which shows that there was $487,000 worth of real estate so seized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the evidence in this record shows that the greater part of this property was used by the Army for army purposes, and for that part of it there is not one dollar of compensation asked or proposed in this bill. That part of the real estate which was not used actually by the Army of the United States and for military purposes was turned over to B. F. Flanders, supervising agent of the Treasury Department, and the rents of the property so turned over to him were collected by him and accounted for to the Treasury, and it is to that part of the claim of these ladies that this bill refers, and to that part alone. I desire to emphasize the fact that no part of the $38,000 which this bill calls for is sought as compensation for property used by the Army or for military purposes. The bill refers only to rents collected from that part of the property which the Army had no need for and did not use, and which General Banks turned over to the special agent of the Treasury Department to collect the rents and account for them to the Department. So this is not a case of property taken and made use of by the Army.

A part—to wit, $14,300—of the amount included in the bill arose in this way:

Miss Ida A. Slocomb, then a young lady, one of the ladies who obtained this permit from General Butler, owned four stores on New Levee and Tchapitoulas streets, New Orleans. Notwithstanding the fact that they were under seizure by order of General Banks and in possession of Mr. Flanders, the special agent of the Treasury Department, Miss Slocomb caused those stores to be insured, and I hold in my hand a certified copy of the policy of insurance. They were burned down in January, 1864, and a very short time after they were burned, within a few weeks, the following letter was addressed to the president of the insurance company:

OFFICE CHIEF QUARTERMASTER, DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, January 20, 1864.

Sir: In obedience to superior orders, I require you to pay over to me at this office the amount of $15,000, being the amount of cash due by the company over which you preside to Miss Ida A. Slocomb on the policy of insurance for risk taken on her four buildings recently destroyed by fire on Tchapitoulas street.

This order must be complied with at once. A failure on your part will incur the penalties of General Orders 73 and 82, of date 18th September and 17th October, 1882.

JOHN W. McCLURE,
Captain A. Q. M.

CHARLES SAGORY,
President of Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company.

In obedience to that order, the Mutual Insurance Company, in which Miss Slocomb had caused her stores to be insured, paid over the money to this officer, and I have here his receipt for it, which I will read if it is called for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let us pay the money back as quickly as possible.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I say so too This money was paid over to this officer of the United States and was accounted for to the Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask why, in the name of justice, in the name of common right, this property, taken in violation of a pledge which the agent of the Government of the United States, General Butler, had given, issued as I have stated, destroyed by fire, and the insurance for such destruction collected by the Government of the United States—why ought not that money be paid over to the beneficiaries of this bill?

Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said about the construction to be placed upon the letter written by General Butler to these ladies. Here are General Butler's three letters. They speak for themselves. He gives his own interpretation of what he meant by the first letter. I will not take time to read again the letters which were read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], but I will read extracts from them.

General Butler, in his letter dated September 25, 1865, when these ladies first made an effort to recover their property and these funds, wrote to them:

When you left New Orleans I pledged my faith, and I supposed the faith of the Government, that your property—

Not "your house" merely. In using the word "house," in his first letter, General Butler meant it as synonymous with estate, possessions, whatever these people owned—what the Slocomb family possessed at that time.

When you left New Orleans I pledged my faith, and I supposed the faith of the Government, that your property should not be disturbed. By acts on the part of those in authority thereafter for which there can be no palliation except ignorance of the fact or of their duty, that pledge was not observed.

Those are his words; that was his interpretation of the pledge he gave these claimants.

In his letter to Mr. A. T. Stone, a gentleman living in Baltimore who was the attorney of these ladies, General Butler, under date of June 20, 1873, says:

At your request, as attorney for Mrs. Slocomb and Mrs. Urquhart, I gave you a statement of the facts in regard to the matter as far as I have any knowledge. When I came to New Orleans I learned that Mrs. Slocomb, while a fast friend of the confederate cause, while her son was serving in the confederate army, yet had manifested her sense of right and justice by refusing to allow the debts which she owed her Northern creditors to be confiscated, and, resisting that very extraordinary and unjust enactment of the confederate congress, had paid and had made arrangements to pay her debts. She was peaceably residing at New Orleans, and did nothing after the advent of the United States troops in the city to merit any animadversion of the commanding general. In an interview I had with her and her daughter, for reasons that seemed to me entirely sufficient, I gave them the pledge of the general commanding that so long as they did no act of hostility to the United States that their property—

Not their house, merely—that their property in New Orleans should not be disturbed nor interfered with; and upon that assurance they desired a pass to go to some country residence in North Carolina.

Then he goes on to state that the acts which constituted a violation of that pledge were unjust and arbitrary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read one other paper only, and I call particular attention to this document which I hold in my hand. It is an affidavit made by William H. Wiegel, "late major and acting adjutant-general, brevet colonel and provost-marshal, Eighth Army Corps."

Major Wiegel says:

In the year 1862 I was in the city of New Orleans, La., and had the honor of serving on the staff of Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler, United States Army, as an aid-de-camp; and while there, in the line of duty, became acquainted with Mrs. Slocomb and her daughters, who were respected for their true nobleness and kindness, and because they, in direct violation of the act of the so-called "confederate congress," refused to allow their debts to Northern creditors to be seized for the use of the so-called "Confederate States."

I believe they were friendly to our people; and in an interview between them and General B. F. Butler—

This is the statement of General Butler's aid-de-camp—

I believe they offered their dwelling or residence to the major-general commanding for the use of himself and his officers, which he nobly and generously declined. He treated them with great respect and esteem, and I believe gave them a safe conduct through our lines. I also know that he gave them a pledge—

Mark this language—

I also know that he gave them a pledge of protection for their valuable property, which was sacredly kept by him and his officers.

If, as I am informed, any officers of the United States Army or Government made any seizure of any of their moneys, valuables, or property after General B. F. Butler retired from the command of that department, it was unjust and disgraceful; in violation of the usuages of war; derogatory to the dignity of the Government, and a violation of the written protection given them by Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler, whose word had also been pledged, and who had guaranteed the good faith of the Government that their property would be protected.

WILLIAM H. WIEGEL,
Late Maj. and A. A. Gen., Brt. Col. and Provost-Marshal Eighth A. C.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 24th day of June, 1873; and I hereby certify that I know the affiant and know him to be entitled to full faith and credit.

Witness my hand.

W. H. HAYWARD,
Justice of the Peace of the State of Maryland in and for the City of Baltimore.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not weary the Committee of the Whole longer in the discussion of this case. I have endeavored to present the facts as I find them in this record intelligently and fairly. I have attempted to distort nothing. It is true that Mrs. Slocomb was in sympathy with the confederate cause from the beginning of hostilities up to the time of the surrender of the city of New Orleans. She does not deny that. General Butler was cognizant of that fact. He did not require of her an oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, but for reasons good and sufficient to himself, representing there the sovereignty of this great Government as its duly accredited agent, he said to these three ladies, one then unmarried, one of them a married lady, and one a widow, "You have my permission to retire to the mountains of North Carolina, and your property here in the city of New Orleans shall be kept inviolate for you."

On the strength of that assurance of the Government of the United States these ladies did leave the city. That pledge was kept by General Butler, and their property remained in the possession of the agent of these ladies until August, 1863—fifteen months after the pledge was given—before that pledge was violated.

All these funds belonging to these ladies, collected from their property, have been turned into the Treasury of the United States. They are not here asking any gratuity or bounty at the hands of the Government of the United States. This is not a case of that sort. They simply point to the fact that by the records of the Department, as they plainly appear (and that fact is not disputed), their money is in the Treasury of the United States. They simply ask that Congress, carrying out the pledge made to them by General Butler, will direct that these moneys be refunded to them.

Mr. Chairman, I have no interest whatever in this case except the desire that even-handed justice be done to these ladies. They are not constituents of mine. I have never met one of them personally. Two of them reside in the city of New Orleans. I live in the extreme northwestern part of the State. One of them is now, and has been for years past, an honored resident of the city of New York. Though I have never met one of them, I know of them well by repute. They are among the best people in the State—ladies of high social station, of eminent Christian character and virtues, of great refinement and culture, and of exemplary lives.

Mr. KLEINER Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to speak long, for in my opinion too much time has been devoted to the discussion on this bill already.

In the first place, I believe that ours is about the meanest Government on the face of the earth, so far as the payment of moneys due to claimants is concerned. To-day we owe hundreds of millions of money justly due to claimants, some of it being due over one hundred years. Think of it! This Government withholds just dues from its own citizens by the millions by brute force alone, causing distress and bankruptcy because it fails and refuses to keep its obligations and contracts inviolate.

Sometimes, as in the case now under consideration, armed force is invoked to help along the spoliation altogether unwarranted by either law, equity, or the necessities of our country in times of peace or war.

Mr. Chairman, for over twenty years the legal representatives of Cora A. Slocomb, of the city of New Orleans, have been appealing to the Congress of the United States for justice. That is all they ever did ask for, and it is all they ask for now.

It is not denied that the Government owes them nearly $39,000, which sum lies in the Treasury to-day. It is not claimed by even the most ardent opponent that this money was "contraband of war" and therefore subject to confiscation at the time of its seizure by the agents of the Treasury. I regret, therefore, to see the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] pursuing these claimants, these poor, defenseless women, from their homes in the city of New Orleans to the mountain recesses of North Carolina. His zeal in this unholy cause could not be improved upon were the object of his search "criminals hunted down for crime."

Within the last twelve years nearly as many favorable reports from the committees of both the Senate and the House in the interest of these claimants have been made on the ground that the seizure was unauthorized and illegal.

Now, in 1862, under a passport furnished to these claimants by the then commanding officer at New Orleans, General Butler, whose powers were that of a military governor, an absolute dictator, whose acts were sanctioned by Congress and President Lincoln, recognized the position of these claimants by granting them protection to life and property in the following letter:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, June 23, 1862.

MESDAMES: I have the pleasure to inform you that my necessities, which caused the request for permission to use your house during your absence this summer, have been relieved. I have taken the house of General Twiggs, late of the United States Army, for quarters. Inclined never on slight causes to use the power intrusted to me to grieve even sentiments only entitled to respect, from the courage and ladylike propriety of manner in which they were avowed, it is gratifying to me to be enabled to yield to the appeal you made for favor and protection by the United States.

Yours shall be the solitary exception to the general rule adopted that they who ask protection must take upon themselves corresponding obligations, or do an equal favor to the Government. I have an aged mother at home who, like you, might request the inviolability of hearth-stone and roof-tree from the presence of a stranger. For her sake you shall have the pass you ask, which is sent herewith.

As I did myself the honor to say personally, you may leave the city with no fear that your house will be interfered with by any exercise of military right, but will be safe under the laws of the United States. Trusting that the inexorable logic of events will convict you of wrong toward your country when all else has failed,

I remain, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major-General.

Mesdames SLOCOMB and URQUHART.

Under this passport given by General Butler they were permitted to leave the city and go into the mountains of North Carolina, where they had a country seat.

Under that order and others, written and oral, they left their property in the keeping as a trust of the officer of the United States who promised that none of it should be molested or destroyed.

Soon after General Butler's retirement from the command of the department of New Orleans and the succession of General Banks the pledges made to claimants were violated, their money was seized, their property destroyed, at least some of it was burned to the ground, and the insurance money due thereon collected and deposited in the Treasury of the United States where it is to-day aggregating the following sums:

To Mrs. Cora Ann Slocomb, for rents collected	$12,246 40
For dividends on gas stock	468 60
		$12,715 00
To Miss Ida A. Slocomb, for rents collected	5,675 00
Amount of insurance collected from Merchants' Insurance Company	14,300 00
Dividends, gas company stock	504 00
		20,479 00
To Mrs. Caroline A. Urquhart, rents collected		5,467 15
Total		38,661 15

This sum has been in our Treasury for more than twenty years, all of it illegally obtained and illegally withheld by this great and magnanimous nation, without a shadow of right save such as might and force can give. It goes without question that had Mrs. Slocomb remained in New Orleans, and not relied on the pledges made to her before leaving as to the safety of her property, she would not be here now asking for what was always hers by right, because she would never have been dispossessed of it.

I believe the gentleman from Iowa stands solitary and alone in his opposition to this bill. He cites law and precedents innumerable, such as suit his purposes, but leaves out the fundamental principles of justice applicable here. The gentleman would have us punish the descendants of those late in rebellion. Chancellor Kent, volume 2, page 388, holds a different view from that of my friend. The judgment of this House must determine for itself as to the relative value of these two opinions. Kent's opinion rests under the disadvantage, it will be claimed, of having been delivered too long ago, and no doubt his loyalty in comparison with that of the gentleman from Iowa will also be open to criticism. I quote from the above volume as follows:

By a bill introduced into Parliament by Sir Samuel Remilly in 1814, and afterward under modifications passed into a law, corruption of blood in cases of felony, except murder, was abolished. The ingenious and spirited defense of the law of forfeiture which was made by Sir Charles Yorke in the middle of the last century, and in which he insisted that it stood on "just social and comprehensive principles and was a necessary safeguard of the state, whether built on maxims of monarchy or freedom," has failed to convince the judgment or satisfy the humanity of the present age.

As before stated, my friend from Iowa cites law—the same kind which Shylock invoked when he demanded not only his victim's treasure but his life also—law manufactured by Congress for the ostensible purpose of benefiting the people, but administered, as my friend would apply it, to plague and oppress them. Let him who doubts this fact listen to the wail of distress that comes here from the oppressed laborer, from every hamlet in our land.

Law! In my opinion we have altogether too much law here, such as it is, and but devilish little justice. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa, if he has any conscience at all, has one all shriveled up, into which the sunshine of humanity never casts a ray; his heart frozen as solid as an iceberg, into which the joys and consolations of a righteous life never penetrated. Who can wonder that a man with such a dilapidated frame should find his chief delight in hunting down these defenseless women in the hope that he may despoil them of their birthright. God pity the man who is so far gone as to stand up here in this court of the nation for two long mortal hours, clawing the air and calling upon the evil spirits below to smite with their vengeance the beneficiaries of this bill.

I pity him in his wretched loneliness; for so far as I can learn, his report here to-day is the only minority report which has found its way into the different Congresses during the last twelve years.

In the Forty-third Congress a report was brought into this House awarding these claimants the money belonging to them which is now in the Treasury. In the Forty-fourth as well as in the Forty-fifth Congresses favorable reports were made. So, too, in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, in both Houses, and this identical bill having already passed the Senate without division.

Mr. LYMAN. Is it not true in one of the prior Congresses—I will not say which—Mr. Holman and other members of the War Claims Committee submitted a minority report?

Mr. KLEINER. That has not been brought out.

Mr. LYMAN. Is it not true?

Mr. KLEINER. I have not seen any such report.

Mr. LYMAN. If you will examine the record you will see there has been a report like that which I have indicated.

Mr. KLEINER. Possibly there may. I do not know whether my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] will vote for the bill or not; he is here to answer for himself.

But, sir, I desire to introduce a witness in the shape of a report made by B. F. Flanders, special agent of the Treasury, which fully sustains my position:

OFFICE SUPERVISING SPECIAL AGENT TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Third Agency, New Orleans, August 14, 1865.

SIR: The letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 20, relating to the case of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and her daughter, Ida A. Slocomb, and Caroline A. Slocomb, wife of David Urquhart, has been received. And, on this case, I have the honor to report the following facts:

The properties of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and her daughters, Miss Ida A. Slocomb and Mrs. Urquhart, were seized by the military authorities and turned over to this agency by Capt. J. W. McClure, A. Q. M., for which I executed my official receipts, dated August 11 and 13 respectively, 1863, as per copies herewith annexed, marked A, B, C, and D.

Upon investigation it was found that only three buildings belonging to Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb had been taken possession of by the military authorities, two of them for strictly military purposes, and part of the other, a hotel, was occupied as quarters for troops, and the stores underneath by private parties, the rent of which was collected by Capt. McClure, A. Q. M.

H. F. Baldwin, a partner of the commercial firm of Cuthbert H. Slocomb & Co., applied to me for the release of the properties belonging to Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and Miss Ida A. Slocomb. A copy of said petition is hereto annexed and marked E. For the reasons therein stated I released the property to the said Baldwin, under bond and security. But in January, 1864, the said Baldwin was drowned while attempting to cross Lake Pontchartrain in a skiff; whereupon I ordered the local special agent in charge of abandoned property to take possession of all the property belonging to Mrs. and Miss Slocomb turned over to me by the military authorities, together with all other property reported by said Baldwin as belonging to Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb. A copy of the seizure is herewith inclosed and marked F.

The rents collected on the different houses amount to $17,921, as per abstracts marked C and H.

The property of Mrs. Urquhart was taken possession of when turned over by the military authorities, and the rent collected therefrom amounts to $5,467.15, as per abstract marked I. The expenses for taking care of the above-mentioned houses are not included in the expenses enumerated; neither is the expense of collecting the rents. The proportionate amount on each property for collecting rents, &c., is about $22.

The residence of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb has been occupied by H. F. Baldwin up to the time of his death, when Major-General Banks ordered the house to be vacated; and it has been since then occupied by officers of his staff, and others, and at present it is occupied by Maj. Gen. P. H. Sheridan.

The other houses for which no rent is collected are in military possession, for which the respective vouchers are on file in this office.

As to the collection of insurance money on property destroyed by fire, owned by Ida A. Slocomb and the dividends upon stock in the New Orleans Gas Company, I am unable to give any information, no moneys having been turned over to me by the military authorities as derived from such sources.

Of the past political status of the parties, I can only say that they were rebels, having supported the rebellion in this city up to the time of the arrival of Major-General Butler by money and influence. David Urquhart, the husband of Mrs. Urquhart, was a rebel colonel on the staff of the rebel general, Joseph E. Johnston; and Cuthbert H. Slocomb, son of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb, was captain of the fifth company of the rebel Washington Artillery of this city, and remained in the rebel army till the surrender of Robert E. Lee.

Permission having been granted Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and her two daughters by Major-General Butler to go beyond the Federal lines, she went and remained there until the surrender of all the rebel armies, and has only lately returned to this city.

A copy of General Butler's letter granting the permission is herewith inclosed, marked K. This is a correct copy of the original, which I have seen signed by General Butler's own hand.

It is claimed by the daughter of Mrs. Slocomb that the permission included them; whether such was its intent I do not know. I do know, however, that the daughters went out with their mother.

While General Butler remained in command of this department the property remained in the hands of Mrs. Slocomb's friends or agents. It was seized by the officers of General Banks soon after he took command here. The Slocomb family were all active promoters of the rebellion till the capture of the city; but I have no proof that they have aided or countenanced the rebels since they left the city with General Butler's permission and went to live among them.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN F. FLANDERS,
Supervising Special Agent, Third Agency, T. D.

This report demonstrates the fact that if these claimants had not received permission to leave the city of New Orleans and the safety of their property guaranteed to them during their absence, they would have remained at home to protect it. Therefore it was a breach of national faith to pledge them protection while they were present and violate the same as soon as they were gone.

It is further true that as soon as claimants heard of the destruction of their property and the seizure by the agents of the Government of what was left, they demanded permission to come back from their mountain retreat and save what they could. Even this was denied, and for three years the spoliation went on and the rightful owners, however willing, were prevented from saving it by the army of occupation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that in every case like this this strong Government should not be permitted to escape its responsibilities and obligations any more than obtains to that of a private citizen. It can not afford to repudiate its just obligations simply because the citizen is too weak to make a successful resistance. Whenever it is able to do so the wrongs of the humblest citizen should not go unredressed for a moment. This Government, founded upon constitutional rights and supported by the will and consent of the governed, must be as swift in correcting its own errors as it is vigilant in correcting those against it, whether caused by a foreign or domestic foe. In this way alone can you perpetuate the national faith and secure the approval of the people.

With the passport of the Government in their possession these ladies felt secure. How secure is now a matter of history, for their property and money were seized and turned into the Treasury. It lies there to-day, and this bill merely provides that it shall be returned, as so much stolen property, to the rightful owners.

In justice to General Butler it is proper to say that while he controlled the department at New Orleans the pledges heretofore made were faithfully kept, and only when the department fell into the hands of another were they violated.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings;

A bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md.;

A bill (H. R. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.; and

A bill (H. R. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

IDA A. RICHARDSON AND OTHERS.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I realize the fact that there has been a considerable amount of time already taken up in the consideration of this measure, and I realize further that there are some other bills following this upon the Calendar in which parties are very much interested, and I shall, therefore, be very brief in my remarks.

I perhaps would not be called upon to say anything if it were not for the remark of my colleague from Indiana [Mr. KLEINER] that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] stood alone in his opposition to this bill. I voted with him in the committee against the majority report, and as he is thus assailed by a member of our committee as being the only living man who ever opposed this bill, I feel it to be my duty to stand by him as best I can.

Now, I shall not attempt to follow the argument of my colleague from Iowa, because he has caused the statutes to be read and has read from the decisions of the courts, in which he shows the absolute right of the Government to take possession of this property. I am led to the conclusion that his argument is unanswerable from the fact that gentlemen who favor this bill have seen fit to make their arguments in reply without attacking his legal ground. Even the learned and ingenious gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] did not dare to attack his legal argument, nor did the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] nor the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KLEINER]. Mr. KLEINER is compelled to use the very queer expression that "there is too devilish much law against them" in this case, and they want justice and not law. Therefore I am driven to the conclusion that the friends of this bill are bound to admit that from a legal standpoint they have no standing in this committee, and that the statute is against them, that of August, 1862 and 1863, which gave the military power of the Government the right to take and confiscate this property as they did the property of every other rebel in Louisiana. Then they are driven back to the sole position that they rely for the recovery, upon the letter of authority given by General Butler.

Now, I lay down this proposition: That if these people forfeited the right to this property under the law, General Butler under his orders had no right to pick out from the mass of the people there three citizens in the city of New Orleans and give them particular and peculiar rights that the law did not grant to them. If the property was to be forfeited, it was to be forfeited upon two conditions. One was that they were not loyal citizens, and the other that by the act of Congress the property was subject to forfeiture. General Butler in the face of that statute can not give any rights which they had not by virtue of the law; and if their property was forfeited by virtue of the law, which these gentlemen by their arguments admit, then he had no power to take from the Government the right to take possession of this property.

But conceding now for the sake of argument that General Butler had the right to do what he did, and as the gentlemen who favor the bill base their right to recovery upon that authority, I ask the committee and this Congress to hold them to the record and the right that General Butler gave and nothing more.

Gentlemen make the assertion now that when the friends of this measure say that General Butler gave them—that is to say, the parties interested here—universal amnesty, that he gave the universal right to go beyond the limits of his military district, and that all their property should be protected during their absence. I claim that when that assertion is made they are traveling clear outside of the record. Why, the gentleman from Louisiana arraigns my colleague on the committee from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] because he says there is no evidence in the record of certain facts, and attempts to contradict him by reading the petition of a man who was appealing to the General Government himself to have this property turned over, in which he alleges they took the oath of allegiance, in a paper not under oath. I admit if the gentlemen were to present the many statements of fact that could be made here not under oath, which this House must accept as evidence if it accepts it in this and similar cases, you could readily prove that Fort Sumter was never fired upon. But that was not the point which the gentleman from Iowa makes. He makes the point that there was no evidence in this case. Now if the committee will bear with me for about a minute, here is the famous letter written by General Butler, upon which these gentlemen rely, and what is it?

> As I did myself the honor to say personally, you may leave the city with no fear that your house will be interfered with by any exercise of military right, but will be safe under the laws of the United States.

Ah, but, say our opponents, that applies to all the property of these parties. I reply that no lawyer construing this letter as a legal document can hold that it applies to anything but the house in which they live, and why? Because you have got to construe that paragraph in this letter with the rest of the letter, which is:

I have the pleasure to inform you that my necessities, which caused the request for permission to use your house during your absence this summer, have been relieved.

It appears that he demanded the use of their house, their private house, for his headquarters, and in this letter he informs them that the necessity for the use of the property has been relieved. Then he says "you can leave the city with the assurance that your 'house' will be protected," not your store-room.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do you suppose that General Butler in writing that letter intended to reserve the right to despoil the balance of the property of that lady?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not the question presented here.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I am not here to answer as to what General Butler intended. But the gentlemen who favor this bill are basing their whole claim to have it passed upon the force of General Butler's letter. I am here to construe it according to its legal meaning and import.

Mr. KLEINER. Will the gentleman give way for a question.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir; and I will answer it, if I can.

Mr. KLEINER. Will the gentleman state by what right is this $38,000 belonging, as we claim, to these claimants now in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Why did not you answer the argument made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] when he read the statutes and decisions of the Supreme Court? You have taken an hour and a half to reply to him and not one of you has touched the legal argument he has made. That money is in the Treasury of the United States for two reasons: Because Congress believed that if a man or a woman was a traitor to the country they should forfeit their property. It is there because that statute is in existence and because these people were not loyal. That is the reason it is there.

Now I trust gentlemen will not attempt to lead me away from the line of the argument I am making. I say that letter applied to the dwelling-house and not to the store-rooms and other property. General Butler says: "I have taken the house of General Twiggs for headquarters; consequently I do not want yours." Then he says, "You may go beyond the lines; your house that I have been negotiating with you about shall be protected, but not your gas stock, not your other property. And why? Because that comes under the law of the United States, and under that they have the right to take your property as abandoned if you leave it. I will stand by you and see your house is protected. But if you pass beyond my lines into the rebel country you must take your chances of having your other property taken under the law."

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. Did this woman who is the claimant in this case take up arms against her Government or do any other overt act of treason?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir; but all the male relatives she had in the world did, her sons and sons-in-law; and she did what was more detrimental to us—she gave her money to carry on the war.

Mr. SOWDEN. What evidence is there of that?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. The evidence is in the record.

Mr. KING. There is not a line of such evidence.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I may remark here that there is nothing in this statute that makes any distinction as to the loyality of parties on account of sex. It applies to all alike.

General Butler looked upon this woman as being disloyal. She makes no pretense to prove that she was loyal. He says:

Trusting that the inexorable logic of events will convict you of wrong towards your country when all else has failed.

The general in his letter that gave her the right to go and that agreed to protect her property said to her: "You are not loyal to the flag of your country, but I hope that the inexorable logic of events will yet convince you that you are wrong, and cause you to return to your allegiance to the Government."

They say that General Butler meant by this letter to cover all the property. They attempt to construe the letter in that sense, and in order to do that they bring the evidence of General Butler in September, 1865, after he had ceased to be agent of the General Government—after he ceased to have any power to bind the General Government. They then asked him for another letter in which they requested him to construe his former letter, and upon that construction they rely. In that letter he says:

MADAM: For anything I have done in getting the restoration of your property I neither desire nor require thanks. When you left New Orleans I pledged my faith, and I supposed the faith of the Government, that your property should not be disturbed. By acts on the part of those in authority thereafter, for which there can be no palliation except ignorance of the fact or of their duty, that pledge was not observed.

Now, notice this:

I am far too used to obloquy to mind a little more or less.

I call the attention of gentlemen to this:

Your claim for the property in your house must rest, if anywhere, upon my pledge to you when in command.

Why, sir, he has construed that first letter himself as applying to the house, and to nothing else.

Your claim for the property in your house must rest, if anywhere, upon my pledge to you when in command.

Showing that in 1865, when he had just come out of the Army, when the war was just over, he then understood that all the protection he gave her was to the house that he had negotiated with her about as headquarters, and he so construes this himself.

Even if you seek in passing this bill to make it an exception to take this case out of the law, to take it out of the force and effect of the statute, and to give these parties their property back, and do not seek to make it a precedent by which you shall return every dollar of property taken by the force of that statute, I ask you in all candor, I ask you here as legislators for the people to protect their rights and to guard the Treasury, and in order to do that I ask you to stand by that letter and construe it strictly, and put the construction upon it that General Butler put upon it himself, and that is that he pledged himself to protect the property in her house and no other.

Mr. BRADY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. One at a time. I will hear first the question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. BRADY. The gentleman stated a while ago that no legal argument had been submitted in support of this claim. I beg leave to call his attention to Senate Report No. 846, in the Forty-eighth Congress, which contains this language:

Under these circumstances——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Wait a moment.

Mr. BRADY. This is the report of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, I am not going to answer a question in which the gentleman puts my statement in his own way and does not put it correctly. I did not say that there had been no legal argument presented. I said that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] had made a legal argument here against the bill which upon its face was unanswerable, and that the gentlemen upon the other side had ignored that argument and had virtually conceded that his position was correct.

Mr. BRADY. But the gentleman will see that that statement of his was misleading. If he will listen to what is set forth in this report he will see that there is a legal argument, and I think a strong legal argument, made in favor of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand the gentleman's position, but he can not force me into saying something that I did not say. Now, what question does the gentleman from Louisiana wish to ask me?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I was going to ask the gentleman why it was, if General Butler's letter referred only to the protection of the house, that for fifteen months after that pledge was given this other property remained unmolested in the hands of the agent of its owners, who are now claimants here.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I do not know, sir. I was not down there, and I can not tell anything about the surroundings.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But is not that fact a practical construction of General Butler's letter?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I suppose there was some reason for it. Did not they collect the rents for the property?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The property was not siezed until fifteen months afterward.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. But did not they collect the rents?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No, sir; not until fifteen months later—not until after General Banks took command, in August, 1863.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, I do not know what the reasons were. I suppose there was a good deal of other property there that was not taken possession of; and what peculiar reasons induced General Butler not to take possession of this property I am not here to state. Neither are we on this side here to answer what it was that prompted General Butler to pick these ladies out and give them a special permit to leave. They may have had some influence over him that I know nothing about.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, in all probability, the fact that this lady, Mrs. Slocomb, had been a Union woman and opposed to secession, may not have been the reason for General Butler's partiality?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. He was partial to that kind of ladies.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As to the question of loyalty, they make no attempt to prove that these parties were loyal. They can not place the claim upon that ground. They have to place it solely upon the ground on which it is placed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Illinois, the ground that General Butler gave this lady permission to leave the city and agreed to protect her property.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And that he was the best possible judge of what ought to be done under the circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. They put it upon the further ground that General Butler was the best possible judge as to what should be done in the case, but when they put it upon that ground I ask them to construe General Butler's letter as it reads, and not to ask us to believe that because he agreed to protect a house he thereby agreed to protect all the other property which this lady left behind her when she voluntarily went away.

Mr. KLEINER. If the argument of the gentleman is to hold, why did not the Government properly confiscate this money or other property?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I am not here to answer that. I am here to answer the case that the gentlemen on the other side have made in their arguments. If it is put now on the ground suggested in the gentleman's question, then every dollar of property that was taken by virtue of a military order must be refunded. When he is met upon the legal proposition, and upon the question of the effect of this letter of General Butler, the gentleman comes back and asks me why the military authorities did not do this, that, and the other thing. I am here to deal with the facts as I find them in this record, and when I do that I have discharged my duty to my constituency by looking after their interests.

Mr. SOWDEN. If the legal view is to prevail, could that property be legally confiscated without this lady being tried and convicted of disloyalty?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Well, it appears to have been done. I will answer the gentleman by a little story. Out in our country a man went to his lawyer one time and said: "Look here, John, if I see a man knocking another down and beating him, can I arrest him and put him in jail?" "No; you can not;" said the lawyer. "But I tell you I can," replied the other, "because I have done it." That is a sufficient answer to the gentleman's question.

It can be done, because it has been done by the authority of General Butler, the man on whose action this claim for relief is based. It is too late now to discuss that question. I infer from the form of the questions put to me that gentlemen on the other side are undertaking to base this claim upon the ground that the taking possession of this property was military usurpation and that therefore every dollar must be refunded. If gentlemen are putting it on that ground, let them come up and make the issue fairly; let them argue the question from that standpoint; let them not come here and seek to divert me from answering the argument which has already been made.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I had intended, and more than I would have occupied but for the numerous interruptions of my friends.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, so much time has been consumed in the discussion of this bill that I feel to prolong the debate may possibly be giving more consideration to the arguments made against it than they merit. Still, Mr. Chairman, I feel it due to myself to explain my connection with this claim and give briefly my reason for advocating its passage. The bill in its present form passed the Senate some time in the month of February, was reported to this House, and referred to the Committee on War Claims. It was then referred to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] as a subcommittee. After due consideration he reported the bill back to the committee and asked that the bill be reported to the House adversely. He gave his reasons for his opinion, and from his statement of the case I became satisfied that the claim was just and should be paid.

Upon my motion the committee decided to report the bill favorably to the House, and then I was put in charge of the bill, reported it to the House, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] presented a minority report signed by himself. I have no interest in the matter—do not even know any of the parties interested in the claim—but I find that these ladies were living in New Orleans when General Butler took possession of that city in 1862, and that after he had been awhile in the city they asked permission from him to go to their summer home in North Carolina, and also asked for the protection of their property during their absence. General Butler gave them the leave asked for, and also his pledge that their property should be protected and kept intact for them. Some months afterward General Butler was relieved, and General Banks took command at New Orleans.

Some time after General Banks took command he issued his famous order, "General Order No. 202," under which a large amount of property was taken possession of and used by the Army. The Slocomb property was included in that amount. Four storehouses belonging to the estate were afterward burned. These storehouses were insured by Mrs. Slocomb before her departure from the city. General Banks's quartermaster collected the amount of insurance from the insurance company and paid it into the United States Treasury. He collected rents for other property belonging to the Slocomb estate and dividends on gas stock owned by them and paid that also into the United States Treasury or used it for maintenance of his troops.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in the case of the Planters' Bank vs. Union Bank (16 Wallace, 494), that said Order No. 202 was unauthorized and void, and therefore the taking of this property, and afterward collecting the proceeds and attempting to put it beyond the reach of its real owners was illegal and unjustifiable. As I have said, I have simply found these facts to exist, and am convinced that the Government now has this money in its vaults unjustly and without a shadow of right, and I believe it should be paid back at the earliest moment possible. I believe the Government should be held as strictly to account as an individual, and that the citizen should not be required to suffer unjustly for the simple reason that the Government has the power to take and hold his property. No other construction can justly be put on this case than that the Treasurer finds himself in charge of this money without legal right, and is holding it simply as a trust, waiting for the necessary legislation to empower him to pay it to its rightful owner.

Mr. Chairman, I am one who believes that the Government is bound, or should be bound, by that constitutional provision that says that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." I believe that the man who contributed of his money or property of any kind for the immediate necessities of the Army is as much entitled to pay as the man who converted his property into money and put it into bonds. The citizen who lived in the path of the Army had his property destroyed and in many instances his home left in ashes, but that class of people come here only to be turned away with the assurance that this Government is not paying for casualties of war.

I believe this is wrong and that all just claims growing out of the war properly chargeable to the United States Government should have been paid years ago, or as fast as the increasing prosperity of the country would have justified their payment without making taxation burdensome to the people; or, in other words, that the Government should have paid these claims as rapidly as it was able, and I believe that we are in a condition now to adjust them, and that it should be done at the earliest possible moment.

But this case is not what is termed a casualty of war, but the deliberate collection of money by the officers of the United States Government without any real legal authority.

This whole case rests upon General Butler's authority to grant the permission to these ladies to leave the city of New Orleans and pledge the faith of the Government to the protection of their property. General Butler was in New Orleans at that time as the sole representative of the authority of the United States Government. At the time he entered the city he made known to the people of the city the terms upon which they could remain in possession of their property. These terms were very stringent, and he made only one exception, and that was in the case of Mrs. Slocomb and her daughters.

In that case, for reasons sufficient to himself, and which he clearly set forth in his letter of June 23, 1862, to them, he permitted them to leave the lines of the United States Army and go to their home in North Carolina. Now, I hold that the United States Government was pledged to the protection of their property by this letter of General Butler's. He being the sole representative of the United States Government in New Orleans at that time, all acts of his as the commanding general of the United States Army were regarded as valid, and were observed to the letter by all the departments of the United States Government, and the permision given to these ladies should not and can not be regarded as an exception. I hold that the United States Government can not afford to be found disregarding its sacred obligations to the citizens with whom it makes contracts. This order of General Butler's was as binding, under the circumstances, as could have been any act of the Government of the United States, and as long as General Butler remained in command the pledge given by him was strictly fulfilled, and was never violated until after General Banks had taken possession of the city.

All the facts in this case are admitted. It is admitted by those who oppose the bill that the property was in New Orleans; that General Butler gave the letter to these ladies permitting them to leave the city, and that the promised protection to their property was given; it is admitted that the stores were burned and the insurance money collected, that the dividends from the gas stock were collected, and that rents were collected, and that all this money was turned into the Treasury or used to maintain the troops; but it is denied that the contract or obligation of General Butler was binding upon the Government, because these ladies were said to have been disloyal.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] has made a technical argument to try to prove that the Government ought not to pay a just claim, and the only reason that he has given, and upon which he attempts to maintain his opposition, is, that these ladies were disloyal. But the gentleman forgets that all history holds to condemnation those who, as conquerors, make terms with a capitulating people and then violate them; and he forgets also that the Government of the United States had a right through its chosen representative to make a contract with these people, notwithstanding their sympathies, that should be as binding as any contract that the Government could make with any one. The Government of the United States has no more right to disregard the contract made by General Butler in this instance than it has to disregard the terms of capitulation given by General Grant to Lee's army at Appomattox. This was a contract made with the citizens of a capitulating city, and the terms at Appomattox were made with a like capitulating people.

The first thing to be considered is the validity of the order of General Banks of the 17th of August, 1863. The city was in quiet possession of the United States forces; it had been captured more than fifteen months before that time, and undisturbed possession was maintained ever after its capture. Hence, the order was no attempt to seize property flagrante bello, nor was it a seizure for immediate use of the army; it was simply an attempt to confiscate private property, which, though it may be subjected to confiscation by legislative authority, is, according to the modern law of nations, exempt from capture as booty of war. Still, as the war had not ceased—though it was not flagrant in the district—and as General Banks was in command of the district, it must be conceded that he had the power to do all that the laws of war permitted, except so far as he was restrained by the pledged faith of the Government or by effect of Congressional legislation.

The pledge had been given by General Butler that the rights of property should be respected, and in his order dated May 1, 1862, he said that all rights of property, of whatever kind, would be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States. This, as was remarked in the case of the Venice, only reiterated rules established by the legislative and executive action of the National Government in respect to the portions of the States in insurrection occupied and controlled by the troops of the Union. That action, it was said, indicated the policy of the Government to be, not to regard districts occupied and controlled by Union troops as in actual insurrection or their inhabitants as subject, in most respects, to treatment as enemies. Substantial, complete, and permanent military occupation and control was held to draw after it the full measure of protection to persons and property, consistent with the necessary subjection to military government. I do not assert that anything in General Butler's proclamation exempted property within the occupied district from liability to confiscation as enemies' property, if, in truth, it was such; all that we claim is, that, after that proclamation, private property in the district was not subject to military seizure as booty of war.

But admitting, as we do, that private property remained subject to confiscation, it is undeniable that confiscation was possible only to the extent and in the manner provided by the acts of Congress. These acts were passed on the 6th of August, 1861, and on the 17th of July, 1862. No others authorized confiscation of private property, and they provided the manner in which alone confiscation could be made; they designated the Government agents for seizing enemies' property, and they directed the mode of procedure for its condemnation in the courts. The system devised was necessarily exclusive. No authority was given to a military commander, as such, to effect any confiscation. It is, therefore, of little importance to inquire what, under the general laws of war, are the rights of the conqueror, for during the recent civil war the Government of the United States asserted no general rights, in virtue of conquest, to compel the payment of private debts to itself; on the contrary, it was impliedly disclaimed, except so far as the acts of 1861 and 1862 asserted it. These enactments, declaring that private property belonging to certain classes of persons might be confiscated in the manner particularly described, are themselves expressive of an intent that the rights of conquest should not be exercised against private property, except in the cases mentioned and in the manner pointed out. Therefore I hold that the seizure of this property was wholly without authority of law.

But the gentleman from Iowa says the most serious and weighty objection to the bill now under consideration is the undisputed disloyalty of the beneficiaries. Let us apply a test to their loyalty. Before the United States troops took possession of the city of New Orleans the Slocombs were engaged in the hardware business, and, as is usually the case, in the transaction of their business owed considerable sums of money to Northern creditors. The Confederate States congress passed an act requiring all persons within the seceded States who owed debts to Northern people to pay the amount of those debts into the treasury of the Confederate States government. The Slocombs disregarded that act of the Confederate States congress and did pay large sums of money, to the amount of all their indebtedness, to their creditors in Pittsburgh and other places North.

It is not denied that the brother of one and the son of another were officers in the confederate army, nor is it denied that the sympathies of these ladies were with their family and their friends; but after the capture of New Orleans General Butler was satisfied that whatever their sympathies or sentiments may have been, their conduct was such that it not only did not manifest itself in any hostility to the Federals or in any leaning to the confederate cause during his occupancy, but the conduct of these ladies which had come under his view had entitled them to particular consideration and to the safeguard which he promised and extended to them. That they had kept their pledge to General Butler after leaving New Orleans must have appeared to the satisfaction of the President of the United States in 1865, when he granted them a pardon and ordered the restoration of their property; for one of the facts brought out in the case is, that in 1865 the President of the United States issued an order restoring to the Slocomb family what was left of their property in New Orleans; and it is also brought out that he expressed regret that it was not in his power to return it all, the money which had gone into the Treasury being beyond the reach of any power except the legislative action of Congress.

The attempt to prejudice the interests of these ladies and their minor children by the suggestion that the son of one and brother of another were officers in the confederate army is unworthy of the position of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States in this day and generation, and it is surprising to find, at this late day, men in the Congress of the United States who allow their political prejudices to carry them so far as to hinder them from doing strict and exact justice to any and all the Government creditors. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, if I may judge from my short experience, that a great part of the time of Congress is taken up with the drawing of hair-splitting distinctions on this question of claims. I have seen much of that sort of thing in connection with war claims, and some effort is continually being made to throw such obstructions in the way as to hinder, instead of expedite, the adjustment of just and legal claims of persons who suffered loss during the war.

We find that it has been the settled rule of practice in the past, and so continues, to try to convince the House in one case that a man's place of residence should make his claim unjust, while in another case it is what a man thought that should make it unjust; for instance, it is said that no claims must be paid to people, no matter what their politics or how loyal to the Government, who lived in States declared to be in rebellion, and then, on the other hand, that no claim must be paid to a man who lived in loyal territory however just the claim or however well recognized as just and proper by the officer in command at the time the property was taken or the loss occurred, unless such claimant can show vouchers for his property given by an officer in command, and he himself is proven to have been not only not disloyal, but positively and affirmatively loyal.

So, in one instance, a man's loyalty avails him nothing but the territory in which he lived, and in another case the territory in which he lived avails him nothing, but it is his supposed opinion that decides his case.

But the gentleman from Iowa claims that if these people had any right to this property their remedy was in the common-law courts. He is a good lawyer, and he knows that the common-law courts have no jurisdiction in cases of this character—not even the Court of Claims, which is clothed with a very limited and special jurisdiction. This case comes within that portion of the jurisdictional power of the Government which Congress reserves to itself; and the assertion that claims will not be reported favorably to this House where they have been rejected by any other tribunal can not be true as to cases of this character, for all through the years past since the war claims rejected by other tribunals of the Government have been reported upon favorably and passed by the Congress of the United States. Even this case has been reported favorably to one branch or the other of Congress at least seven different times. This claim was not rejected in the sense Mr. LYMAN intends; neither the War nor the Treasury Department had jurisdiction or was authorized to act. But if they had rejected this claim the evidence shows very fully that it comes within Mr. LYMAN'S exception.

Again, it is said that the evidence leads to the very strong implication that these parties released all claims growing out of this seizure, as against the Government, when their property was returned to them. This assumption or insinuation is absolutely negatived by the uncontroverted evidence in the case. The evidence shows that this property was composed of property held in trust for minors, and that no such a release could be granted by the parties holding it in trust. The claimants—or those of them who were then living—were put into possession of a portion of their property, which was under the control of the executive department, and from that time to this day they have been petitioning the legislative department, which has control of the balance, for its restoration, as the evidence and reports of the several committees of Congress abundantly attest. Some of the beneficiaries were either not born, or were infants, at the time of the appropriation by the United States, under circumstances which the Supreme Court of the United States has decided unauthorized and void, and all the presumptions of law are in favor of, and not against, minors everywhere. As to the elder ladies, one of whom has since died, and who was one of the administrators to guard the succession of her deceased husband for the benefit of her children and grandchildren, in whom, by the law of domicile in Louisiana, all right, title, and interest in the property immediately vests by death of the principal ancestor, there could not have been any release by them of the claims for this poperty.

The motive that induced General Butler to make this contract with these ladies by the issuance of his order has been treated with a mysteriousness by the opponents to this bill that is certainly very hard to explain. General Butler conceals nothing, nor does he attempt to conceal anything as to his reasons for giving the order, but gives his reason in the most manly and positive terms. He says that it was because Mrs. Slocomb reminded him of his own aged mother left at home, and that the application for this leave and this protection had brought it to his mind that, possibly, his mother might some day be compelled to ask mercy at the hands of a stranger. What grander or nobler sentiment could actuate the bosom of a human being? What a grand spectacle, when we see a commanding general, clothed with the highest military power and his brow flushed with the pride of victory, with thousands of men at his command, ready and willing to execute any order, stopping at the sight of a face, in the moment of his triumph, that reminds him of his mother and allowing the recollection of that mother to so take control of his mind and his actions as to lead him to do a noble and a generous deed to a stranger who only brings her memory up before him! It but shows the manliness of the man, and however much prejudice in the past may have been to the detriment of General Butler's fame the making public of this one act will soften every heart in which there exists a spark of human fellow-feeling and love toward him who ruled with an iron hand a southern city that fell in his way as conqueror. For, Mr. Chairman, there are three sentiments that must live in the human breast to make the patriot—love of God, love of country, and love of kind; and he who loves his kind, who is a philanthropist, gives the highest evidence of a pure and unadulterated patriotism; and, for myself, however much of enmity may have been in my breast toward General Butler in the past, the finding of this one bright spot in his record is enough to show me that there are always to be found in men who do great deeds some traits of nobleness of soul.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] has appeared upon the scene, and has grown very vehement, and has told one anecdote that it appears to me embodies his whole argument, and that was with regard to the peace officer who had arrested an offender without a warrant and imprisoned him. When told that he could not arrest a man without a warrant he asserted that he could, because he had already done so. That, in my opinion, is the sum and substance of his argument—because by force this money was taken and put into the United States Treasury, therefore it is legally and rightfully there, and should not be given to its proper owners; or, in other words, that might makes right, no matter if helpless and defenseless women are the sufferers.

Mr. Chairman, the speeches that have been made against this bill were not made, I am sure, for this House, but were made to be used as campaign material in the coming Congressional canvass in the districts in which the gentlemen reside. They are magnificent campaign speeches, and may be used with grand effect in some sections of the country; but in the section from which I come harmony and good will prevail among those who were engaged upon the different sides of the recent conflict at arms, and I had thought that it was universal throughout the country, but since I came to this Hall I have learned, to my astonishment, that, at least with partisan politicians, it is not true. I have heard no subject discussed in this House, no difference what the immediate question was, that the war and its horrors and its issues have not been brought in and made the main theme; and the terms "rebel" and "traitor" have been hurled at those of us on this side of the House who were on the side of the South in that conflict without measure and without stint, and I wish to say right here that these terms have fallen upon us like water on a duck's back, and that we realize that they are only made for campaign purposes, and perchance to arouse us into saying imprudent things. But I want to assure these gentlemen who expect such results that we are no longer to be made angry by these terms; we are not here to lose our temper; we are not here to say indiscreet things. As for myself, I claim to be as loyal to the flag that floats over the Capitol as any man who breathes the free air of America, no matter from what section of the country he comes. I have given evidence of it sufficient and convincing.

Three years of my youth were given to the cause of the South and one year of my manhood, but more than twenty years of the best of my life have been given to loyalty and devotion to the Union. They have been spent in an attempt to aid in advancing the material interests of the country, and I hold that what advances the interests of one section advances the interests of all. Many of us on this side of the House lived in a country at the close of the war that was devastated and ruined; its homes were desolated and its property destroyed; widows' weeds and sackcloth and ashes, with broken hearts and homeless wanderers, were the characteristics most commonly to be met with. We turned no longing eye toward the Treasury of the Federal Government, but by an earnest application of brain and muscle, aided by genial sunshine and grateful showers, went to work to build anew, and, by the blessing of God, we have rehabilitated that once desolate country, and to say that we love that country can not be imputed to us as disloyalty, because, as I have said before, he who loves his country can not be disloyal. We have indulged in no whinings or repinings for the past, but have put that behind us, and, like good men and true, have endeavored to go forward in that direction, and with those aims and purposes that tend to make this the grandest and noblest country on earth.

In pursuit of that end we believe that the just obligations of the Government should be paid, and we come here without prejudice, without political bias, willing and anxious to see justice done in every direction to all those who have just and legal claims against this Government. And we believe that we are maintaining the honor of the Government and aiding in the upbuilding of the country by using our votes and our influence toward the securing of payment to the humble dweller in any section of the country whose claim against the Government is found to be just and right; and we believe this action to be as honorable, too, as when we provided for the payment of the interest and principal to those who hold the bonds of the United States Government. I want to practice the strictest economy, but I want my voice and my vote to be found always requiring the United States to do justice to its humblest citizen, and I am willing to be tried by the record I make; and when this Congress shall have adjourned, I intend that all my actions while a member shall point in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it necessary to move that the committee rise? May not the gentleman move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably? Then we can continue our work upon the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter within the discretion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the committee rise. When this bill is disposed of in the House we can go back into Committee of the Whole.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported back from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson and Caroline Augusta Urquhart.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move the previous question on ordering this bill to its third reading.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LYMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being—ayes 15, noes 92; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FUNERAL OF HON. JOHN F. MILLER.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following special committee to accompany a similar committee of the Senate to escort the remains of the late Senator JOHN F. MILLER from Washington to California: Mr. MCKENNA, Mr. SPRIGGS, Mr. LOUTTIT, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. LAFFOON, and Mr. MILLIKEN.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself again into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I think we can dispose of several bills before the arrival of the time when it will be necessary for the committee to rise.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the Private Calendar.

ESTATE OF FRANK SOULÉ.

Mr. MCKENNA. In view of the fact that I have been appointed a member of the committee to escort the remains of the late Senator MILLER to the Pacific coast, and that I shall possibly be absent from the House for three weeks, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole now take up for consideration the bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are only two or three bills ahead of this, and I think that in view of the fact that the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] is obliged to go away we should extend to him the courtesy he asks.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the estate of the late Frank Soulé, formerly collector of internal revenue of the first district of the State of California, and C. C. Webb, Ira P. Rankin, J. J. Felt, F. H. Waterman, James Dows, Samuel Soulé, the estate of W. H. Dana, deceased, James McM. Shafter, John Center, Horace Kilham, and Samuel Brannan, sureties of the said late Frank Soulé, by bond to the United States bearing date January 12, A. D. 1876, be, and they are hereby, released from any liability that may have accrued in the office of said collector during his term of service; and the proper officer of the United States Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel and discharge said liability, whether the same be pending in court or has become a judgment.

Mr. MCKENNA. The facts out of which this bill has arisen are these: Mr. Frank Soulé was collector of internal revenue for the first internal-revenue district of California. He received from the assessor of said district the assessment books, which however were incorrectly computed; that is, no computation or addition of one column had been made, but on the contrary was entirely omitted—and items also from other columns had been omitted. He receipted to the assessor for the total amount computed, and when he turned over the money and settled finally he settled according to those computations, not knowing that an embezzlement had been committed by the aid of one of his clerks acting in collusion with one or more of the assessor's clerks. This embezzlement was discovered after he had gone out of office. He was not informed of it until fourteen or sixteen months, and when he was it was too late to fix the responsibility where it belonged, and too late to recover from the clerk or clerks who had actually embezzled the money. His bondsmen and himself, in order to ascertain the extent of the fraud and in the hope of finding out who had committed it, instituted the very suit which resulted in the judgment which was found against them.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is the amount of the judgment?

Mr. MCKENNA. Eleven thousand seven hundred and twenty-four dollars and twenty-three cents. So convinced were the jury which tried the case that Mr. Frank Soulé had not been guilty of any neglect, that on the contrary he had employed out of his private means clerks to keep the work of his office up and in good condition, that it was only on the express condition, or, rather, in obedience to the express injunction of the district judge who tried the case, that they brought in a verdict against him. I will have read what the jury which tried the case had to say on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

We, the jury before whom was tried the case, The United States vs. Frank Soulé and his bondsmen, in the circuit court of the United States, at the February term of said court, in the year A. D. 1875, certify that we rendered a verdict against Mr. Soulé and his sureties in favor of the United States for the sum of $11,744.23 in obedience to the instructions of Judge Sawyer. We further certify that from the evidence it was, and now is, our opinion that no part of said embezzlement arose from any default or negligence on the part of said Frank Soulé. We also certify that it satisfactorily appeared to us that Mr. Soulé was internal-revenue collector a little over four years, during which time he collected and paid into the Federal Treasury nearly $20,000,000.

We therefore respectfully and earnestly recommend that Congress pass a bill to relieve the said Frank Soulé and his sureties from the payment of said sum.

(Signed): E. Gordon, foreman; George W. Bell, Cornelius Storm, A. Roman, S. S. Morton, W. C. Paddock, Phineas Haskell, J. Spaulding, Charles Metzar, Thomas Rogers, and G. C. Hall.

Mr. MCKENNA. Now, unless some gentleman wishes to be heard on this matter, I will move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MCKENNA. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. If I caught the remarks of the gentleman correctly the money was collected and the loss occurred on account of embezzlement by the clerk of the collector.

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Had the collector the appointment of his own clerk?

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes; but the loss was incurred by a collusion between the assessor's clerk or clerks and the clerk of the collector.

Mr. EDEN. It could not have occurred but for the clerk he himself had appointed.

Mr. MCKENNA. There had to be a combination of course to make the fraud effective.

Mr. EDEN. Then if this bill passes the precedent will be established that where a collector of revenue appoints a clerk and that clerk embezzles the funds of the Government Congress will relieve the collector of all responsibility. This collector was responsible for the appointment of his defaulting clerk.

Mr. MCKENNA. That does not necessarily follow; but, if it did, there are abundant precedents to justify the passage of this bill. The Government did not furnish him with enough clerks to verify the computations, and it was in consequence of the lack of clerical force this fraud was possible. It is shown this collector not only employed out of his private means clerks to keep his work up, but that he worked his clerical force even on Sundays.

Mr. EDEN. No matter whether the books were correct or not, the money was collected.

Mr. MCKENNA. It was, or there would not have been any embezzlement and no occasion for this proceeding.

Mr. EDEN. It seems to me it is a novel thing to relieve this collector of responsibility for defalcation of a clerk whom he himself had appointed.

Mr. MCKENNA. It is not a novel thing, for it has been shown this officer was guilty of no negligence, but that he discharged the duties of his office as well as he could with the force furnished him by the Government. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALFRED M'MURTRIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2066) for the relief of Alfred McMurtrie.

The bill was read.

Mr. GEDDES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HIESTAND] who has charge of this bill is not present, and I ask it be informally passed over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

THOMAS M'BRIDE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4836) for the relief of Thomas McBride.

The bill was read.

Mr. GEDDES. I also move that that bill be informally passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY E. WHITEHEAD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4837) for the relief of Mary E. Whitehead.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary E. Whitehead, of Phillips County, State of Arkansas, the sum of $1,178 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the same be accepted in full as compensation for all property belonging to her taken or used by the United States Army during the late civil war.

Mr. LYMAN. I ask for the reading of the report which accompanies that bill. I think it a sufficient explanation.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the petition of Mary E. Whitehead, Fannie C. Metzger (nee Clements), Henry C. Clements, and Minnie E. Clements, heirs at law of Alexander G. Clements, deceased, respectfully reports:

That in 1862 the United States forces, under command of Maj. Gen. S. R. Curtis, occupied the city of Helena, in the State of Arkansas. The petitioners herein were then the owners of a plantation near said city, Mary E. Whitehead being the widow of one A. G. Clements, who died in 1860, and the other claimants his then minor children. They then occupied the plantation as their home, and under the laws of the State of Arkansas the widow was the owner of one-third of the property and the children of two-thirds. The minors have all since reached their majority. The property was owned by said A. G. Clements at the time of his death.

On the occupation of the city of Helena a portion of the troops under General Curtis camped upon the land of petitioners; the length of time is not material in the view which we take of the claim. But the Quartermaster's Department took possession of the barns, sheds, stables, feed-lots, and corrals on the premises and used the same for a period of nineteen months, and also used timber from the plantation for fuel.

The claim was presented to the Southern Claims Commission, which found the value of the property taken to be $3,534, of which one-third, or $1,178, would belong to the petitioner, Mary E. Whitehead, and two-thirds, or $2,356, would belong to the said children. The Claims Commission allowed the claim of the children, after making some small deductions, but rejected the claim of the mother on the ground that the loyalty of Mrs. Whitehead had not been sufficiently established.

In this finding your committee think a manifest injustice has been done Mrs. Whitehead. In the opinion of your committee her loyalty, at a time and place when it cost something to be loyal, is fully established. Your committee is satisfied with the finding of the commission as to the value of the use of the property, and that the petitioner, Mrs. Mary E. Whitehead, should be paid $1,178.

Your committee herewith reports a bill for that purpose (H. R. 4837), and recommends that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are two questions which may be considered in connection with this bill, properly, it seems to me; and one is as to the opening up of the adjudications of the Southern Claims Commission. I think there must have been but few instances up to this time where that has been done; I do not recollect of any.

My friend on my right [Mr. EDEN], tells me that he recalls one instance where this has been done.

We have already provided by law for two tribunals, one established on the 4th of July, 1864, to consider and adjudicate upon claims of an irregular character growing out of the war, occurring in States not in rebellion; and in harmony with that was provided the Southern Claims Commission, either in 1869 or 1870. I think, for the examination of claims in those States that were in insurrection prior to that time, there were pending before those respective tribunals (the latter tribunal lasting for some ten or twelve years) in the prosecution of their labors a vast body of claims in very small amounts, but covering an aggregate of some sixty or seventy thousand in all.

Now, it has been generally assumed that inasmuch as these tribunals had been appointed by law (the Southern Claims Commission, out of which this grows, which had very extraordinary powers, power to go at the expense of the Government to investigate a claim to the scene or locality of the claim and take testimony both for the claimant and in behalf of the Government, an impartial commission, accorded facilities for getting at the facts even beyond those ordinarily possessed by courts of justice) that a sufficient opportunity had been offered for the prosecution of such claims; and the question now presented is whether it is good policy in view of the very small proportion of these claims allowed where a thorough examination was made before the Southern Claims Commission (only about 7 per cent. in all being allowed, and a larger percentage under the act of July 4, 1864), I say it is a question as to the policy of opening up these adjudications by such a measure as this. It opens an extensive field of Congressional action under both laws, the act of July 4, 1864, and the Southern Claims Commission. If neither of these tribunals had been created, Congress might naturally expect the claims to come here for consideration, for when there is no court of relief the citizen may well demand a hearing before Congress.

But since these tribunals have been created, one of them having long since performed its duties and disbanded, and the other rapidly approaching the completion of its work, its existence as a tribunal terminating in the course of a year or two, are we prepared now to say that it is wise policy to open up again this class of claims for consideration?

In both instances these tribunals were invested with extraordinary powers. They were permitted to send commissioners to the location where the claims were said to arise and examine all the facts, both for and against the Government as well as for the claimant; and I repeat, it is a serious question, and one which ought to have been considered and discussed in this report as to the propriety of Congress opening them up after this long lapse of time. For it is manifest now that we must at this late date rely upon purely ex parte testimony for the purpose of impeaching the judgments of tribunals possessed of all the powers that could be conferred upon them to make a thorough and careful examination in view of the subject-matter referred to them; an examination more convenient, more comprehensive, better for the claimants under any law than any court of justice, and yet tribunals with full judicial powers. The claims allowed by these judgments or findings of both the tribunals have all been adjudicated except the allowances, and I refer now to the act of the 4th of July, 1864, made during the last fiscal year or prior to last December.

I think I am justifiable in speaking very freely upon this subject, as I reside in a region of the country where a large body of these claims arose; and I feel confident that there is not a gentleman here who would consent upon appeal to attempt to go into this region of country where the laws apply and have Congress review the decisions made, especially as involving questions of loyalty. Here are judgments rendered upon testimony taken after the organization of the claims commission for and against the claims, when all parties were represented, the Government as well as the party in interest, and it is now proposed to reopen and reverse these upon ex parte testimony, taken solely against the Government. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the subject has not been more thoroughly considered in the report of the committee as to the propriety of opening up that class of claims, and how far ex parte testimony shall be allowed to impair the judgments already rendered, and in countless instances where the money has been already paid. In most of these cases which have been adjudicated, where amounts have been allowed less than the original claim, the testimony for the Government could not at this late day be again procured. They must be decided on purely ex parte testimony. But there are bills now pending to review these judgments in many cases (and I call them judgments, though they were but awards or allowances) where there had been already a proper adjudication by these tribunals.

This property, if I understand the report correctly, was situated within the limits of the district then in a state of insurrection against the General Government.

The Army of the Government was in this district, and the property was occupied by Federal troops. Now, I think that Congress up to this time, as I had occasion to say a few days ago, has never, in considering the general question, gone to the extent of proposing to pay for overt acts of spoliation by the Army or Navy, or for property occupied by the Army at the seat of war; and in the only important legislation touching the subject of late years, the act of 1882, by which these claims were referred to the Court of Claims, that class of claims is expressly excluded, and the reverse of that must be established before the court acquires jurisdiction. That is to say, the loyalty of the claimant is to be established, and the fact must appear that the claimant is not barred by the statute of limitations, and also is not founded upon an act of spoliation, or for the rent or occupation of property by the Federal troops at the seat of war.

I presume no government has ever been able to go to the extent of providing payment for the occupation of property in the ordinary operations of an army. This opens a very wide field, and I am sorry that the committee had not thought proper and that the honorable gentleman who presents this report had not thought proper to have discussed both those propositions more broadly, so that we should have had before us the ground on which the committee believed ex parte testimony should be sufficient to set aside judgments which had been rendered upon impartial testimony for and against the claim, and also as to the propriety of going back on the general policy of Congress of not paying for the occupation of property in the ordinary operations of the armies, which in some instances would be found to embrace whole towns and considerable cities.

Mr. LYMAN. In preparing this report from the Committee on War Claims I had not conceived it necessary in reference to a claim of this kind, and one which to me and to the entire committee seemed so entirely just and plain, to embody in the report all the evidence that was before the committee. There is probably no member upon this floor who has been more inclined to pursue a conservative course in allowing these claims growing out of the late war than I have been. Such has been my record, I think, upon the committee, and, so far as I have had occasion to vote on these questions, such has been my record in this House.

Now, in reference to the first objection made by the gentleman from Indiana that this matter has been adjudicated by a proper tribunal whose decision ought not to be disturbed I heartily concur in all he says upon that subject as a general principle and as a general course of policy for this House to pursue. And such has been the practice and policy of the committee and the policy of the House during this session of Congress. I say the practice and policy, as I understand it, is that where a claim has been passed upon by a competent tribunal it will not be disturbed by this House unless it shall be manifest an injustice has been done. The committee has endeavored to confine itself entirely and closely to that principle, and we thought in reporting in favor of paying Mrs. Whitehead $1,178 that we were adhering to that well-established policy and practice.

The only objection made to the claim in the Southern Claims Commission was the fact that Mrs. Whitehead had not established her loyalty. The property was owned by herself and her two children.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Is there anything for rent involved in this bill, or is it merely for supplies taken by the Army?

Mr. LYMAN. It is for both. The supplies furnished consisted of wood taken off Mrs. Whitehead's premises and used for fuel. And the rent allowed for the use of the premises is not for what was occupied by troops encamping upon her farm, as they did—I know that to be the fact, because my own regiment encamped upon her farm. There is no charge for anything of that kind. But the quartermaster's department took possession of her buildings, of her feed-yard and the corral on her farm, and used them for twenty-one months. For two months of the time she was paid. She claims, although the evidence is not clear on that question, that there was a contract by which she was to be paid rent for her premises, and in that she is corroborated at least by the fact that one quartermaster did pay her two months' rent.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that was not authorized by law.

Mr. EDEN. Can the gentleman state what proportion of the sum allowed in the bill is for rent and what for supplies?

Mr. LYMAN. I can not. The testimony in the case would show that.

Mr. EDEN. I will state what is my reason for making this inquiry. It appears that this case was before the Southern Claims Commission, and they had no jurisdiction over questions of rent; they had jurisdiction only of supplies. I made the inquiry, because the testimony they took would not have had any bearing on the question of rent, because they had no jurisdiction over that.

Mr. LYMAN. As I was saying, the only objection made to Mrs. Whitehead's claim by the Southern Claims Commission was that her loyalty had not been established. They allowed the two-thirds of the claim that went to her children, who were mere children at the time of those occurrences. Their claim was allowed, being two-thirds, and it was paid for the benefit of the children. Her claim was disallowed by reason of the fact that the Southern Claims Commission was not satisfied as to her loyalty.

It has been established by the rule of the committee and by the practice of this House that where a manifest injustice has been done by findings of the tribunals which had jurisdiction of these matters Congress will take cognizance of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The testimony before the Southern Claims Commission was testimony both in favor of this lady and against her.

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it was taken through a public channel, so that it was impartial. Now was not the testimony on which my friend from Iowa is acting here entirely ex parte testimony.

Mr. LYMAN. No, sir; I am coming to that. Mr. Chairman, I was alluding to the proposition that if injustice has been done by the Southern Claims Commission, Congress will take cognizance and give relief. We had before the committee the report of the Southern Claims Commission; we had the evidence taken by the commissioner, reported to the commission, and on which the commission acted. There is additional evidence; but, without regard to the additional evidence which was produced before the committee, which of course was ex parte——

Mr. HOLMAN. Affidavits?

Mr. LYMAN. The testimony taken for the commission was by both affidavits and personal examination.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; and that testimony was taken on the ground. Now this evidence which your committee have considered in overruling the decision of the commission—what is the form of that?

Mr. LYMAN. I was about to say that the additional testimony which was before the committee was in the form of affidavits and was, of course, ex parte. But, laying that testimony out of the case and considering alone the testimony that was before the commission, I am at a loss to know, and I think every member of the committee is at a loss to know, on what theory that commission, with all due respect to their judgment as lawyers and judges, found that this lady was not loyal.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Your committee examined carefully the testimony on that point?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And they are satisfied of the loyalty of the claimant?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir; all of them. I might say that the testimony is almost without dispute that during the entire war Mrs. Whitehead was loyal to the Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Another question. In view of the bill that we have just passed, is the question of loyalty of much account anyhow?

Mr. LYMAN. I think not. I think it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why don't you stop, and let us pass the bill?

Mr. LYMAN. Will you pass it?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a word further to say on this bill. It seems to me that if we are to proceed upon this plan any of the judgments of the Southern Claims Commission, or of any other judicial tribunal, can be easily set aside. Here was a tribunal duly organized, composed of three judges nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, armed with full power to consider such cases. That tribunal did consider this case, and especially this particular point and decided this case, and now a committee of Congress (which of course means one gentleman who is of course a very good lawyer), after the lapse of all these years, takes up the case, considers it again, and comes to the conclusion that the tribunal which decided the case made a mistake; comes to the conclusion, too, not upon testimony taken on the ground, but upon ex parte evidence; or, as a friend suggests, by actually considering the very testimony upon which the tribunal acted—a review of the case, so to speak, upon error apparent on the face of the record.

Mr. Chairman, I think that if our ordinary judicial proceedings were to be subject to review in that manner, and were to be set aside by the casual opinion of a gentleman who, whatever his ability, can not of course devote his mind so entirely to making an investigation of this character as can a judge, we should soon get into difficulty.

Mr. McRAE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McRAE. Is the precedent set by this bill any more dangerous than the one set by the bill which has been passed here releasing a collector from a debt of $11,000 decreed by the solemn judgment of a court?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see much parallel between the two cases. In the one case there is an appeal to the equity of Congress upon all the facts to say whether we will give relief or not, and from time immemorial Congress has granted relief in such cases. In that case even the judges who tried it thought, I believe, that, applying the strict rules of law, injustice had been done.

Mr. McRAE. If the gentleman will permit me, the only difference I see between the cases is that in the one case the Government released a man from an obligation to pay over that which belonged to it, and in this case it agrees to pay to this claimant that which belongs to her.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend assumes that the Government is to pay for all property occupied by the Army during the war, then I concede that from his standpoint his proposition is correct. I do not believe, however, that that should be the policy of this Government. In this case we are not informed how much of the claim grows out of rent and how much is for the burning of fences—spoliation—for it is not pretended that any of this property was taken in the regular way by the Army. I observe that in these matters a precedent is always set by taking a strong case. The claimant here is a lady. That is one strong point. The next strong point is that the claim is for a small amount. Then, next week when a case comes up involving thousands or perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars, it will probably be passed by the House following this precedent, and thus we shall have the judgment of a committee of Congress reviewing and overruling the decision of an impartial tribunal, based upon testimony taken impartially upon the ground—overruling it, too, upon the face of the record of that tribunal, as appears in part to have been the case here. While I have never indulged the hope that Congress could approach a question like this in a judicial spirit, because we deal with cases of this kind rather from the standpoint of legislation than from a judicial standpoint, I do think it is greatly to be deplored that questions of this character should be reviewed by Congress in this way after they have been decided by the properly constituted tribunals.

This claim, if it should have been considered at all, should have been considered by another tribunal. Years ago I heard this House appealed to over and over again in behalf of claims on the ground that the party had no standing anywhere in court, and that this Government could not act so basely as to deprive the citizen of property, or of compensation for property, without a fair and just hearing. But these claims coming before us now have, most of them, been regularly adjudicated. We have established a tribunal with ample facilities for the hearing of such cases. Suppose this case had been referred by Congress or by the Committee on War Claims to that tribunal; suppose that court had made a finding upon the question of loyalty; suppose a mistake had been made, and suppose a review were asked by a tribunal as competent as the one that pronounced the judgment—then we would all feel that we stood upon the bed-rock of justice, making no mistake, setting no bad precedent. But here we are asked to reverse the decision of a court of justice and allow this claim either upon ex parte testimony or upon a review by a committee of Congress of the testimony upon which a court of justice has acted.

Mr. PETERS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this applicant could now go to any court and ask that court to consider this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Application can not be made to the Court of Claims in regard to the claim for rent—of course not. Congress, by a deliberate act, well considered and long discussed, has expressly excluded such questions from the consideration of that court. The partiality of this proposed legislation, its purely class character, is apparent. The Court of Claims can not consider whether in the course of the operations of your Army a town or city has been occupied, and can not allow for the payment of rent which may have accrued under such circumstances. That you have not proposed to allow the court to determine; yet such an allowance is made in this bill.

As to the other property that may have been taken—the wood that was burned, the fences that were destroyed, the inevitable spoliations resulting from the operations of the Army—the claim for that could now be presented, unless probably it is barred by the statute of limitations. In this bill you remove that bar——

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman will allow me one further question. If an injustice has been done to this claimant upon the question of fact in this case——

Mr. LONG. What fact? Loyalty?

Mr. PETERS. The question of loyalty. If an injustice has been done to the claimant upon this question of fact she has no remedy unless by the passage of a bill in Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true. But I put this point to my friend: Here was a tribunal with ample opportunity to investigate the case; that tribunal has investigated it and pronounced judgment.

Mr. ROWELL. Is the Southern Claims Commission the tribunal that investigated it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROWELL. The gentleman will allow me to say I recollect examining a case where that Southern Claims Commission put it into their record that they refused to allow a certain claim because they could not conceive that the quartermaster would permit it to run six months without payment, although the quartermaster's accounts showed he had not made any payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Therefore I suppose my friend would argue that the finding of the Southern Claims Commission is not entitled to much respect. But let us see who constituted this claims commission? Judge Aldis, of Vermont, who has been engaged in many high employments under the Government since that day; Judge Ferriss, of New York, for many years and until recently the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and ex-Senator Howell, of Iowa. Now that tribunal may have made some mistakes, it may be plausibly supposed it did, but is Congress to assume that it did? Is a committee of Congress, acting upon the judgment of a single gentleman, to conclude that that tribunal has made a mistake? I hardly deem it necessary for me to defend the adjudication of such men as I have named. Judge Aldis is recognized as a man of very high ability as a lawyer; Judge Ferriss, who formerly for many years was honored by a seat on this floor, and who went from here to take part in the deliberations of this commission, is one of the ablest men.

I only desire to express my dissent from the policy growing so common—an instance of it occurred on the last day when we went into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and another has occurred to-day—of overruling the decisions of established tribunals of justice upon the judgment of a member of this House who can have given the subject but little consideration; for the action of the Committee on War Claims or any other committee of this House means very often the action of but a single gentleman.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LYMAN that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had directed him to report back sundry bills with a recommendation that they do pass.

ESTATE OF FRANK SOULÉ.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, being a bill (S. 163) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond.

The bill was orderd to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARY E. WHITEHEAD.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4837) for the relief of Mary E. Whitehead.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, it was determined in the affirmative; there being—ayes 49, noes 13.

The bill was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was determined in the affirmative; there being—ayes 66, noes 10.

Mr. LYMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCKENNA moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bills of the following titles, and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (H. R. 6492) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau, survivor of Chouteau, Harrison & Valle; and

A bill (H. R. 3713) for the relief of William Ervin.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. BENNETT, indefinitely, including to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOUK, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHAW, for two days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. EDEN (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until half past 7 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution under which this evening's session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the class of business provided for in the order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order which has been read. The Clerk will report the first bill.

JANE M. LANGLEY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2254) for the relief of Jane M. Langley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane M. Langley, widow of Loudon L. Langley, late sergeant-major of the Thirty-third United States Colored Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK BAUMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4589) granting a pension to Frederick Bauman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Bauman, late a corporal of Company B, of the One hundred and third Regiment New York Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH CHALFANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2011) granting a pension to Joseph Chalfant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Chalfant, late a private in Company L, Sixth United States Cavalry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM BOONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 473) granting a pension to William Boone.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William Boone, late a private in Company F, Eighty-eighth Indiana Volunteers.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Add these words:

"Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM J. SUFFALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 553) granting a pension to William J. Suffall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Suffall, late of Company B, Twenty-first Indiana Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY S. WEBSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4960) granting a pension to Mary S. Webster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, from the date of January 10, 1869, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary S. Webster, dependent mother of Charles T. Webster, late a private in Company H, Forty-second United States Infantry, who died from disease contracted in the line of duty in the military service of the United States.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4960, beg leave to submit the following report:

This bill was favorably reported to the Forty-fifth Congress by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. After a reinvestigation of the case, your committee decide to adopt that report as its own, which is as follows:

"That the said Charles T. Webster enlisted into the military service of the United States in June, 1861. At the battle of Spottsylvania Court-House, in 1864, he lost an arm. For this wound he was discharged and granted a pension, which he continued to draw until he enlisted into the regular Army, in the Forty-second Regiment United States Army, on the 14th June, 1867.

"The evidence shows that the claimant was poor, and depended upon the soldier for support.

"After the amputation of his arm he suffered great pain at times, for the relief of which he was accustomed to take opiates.

"On the 9th of January, 1869, his command was stationed at Madison Barracks, New York. On that day he, while suffering the most intense pain from his wound, took a large dose of laudanum, from the effects of which he died.

"The Pension Bureau rejected the claim of his mother for a pension on the ground that the soldier committed suicide.

"The Surgeon-General says, in substance, that it is his opinion that death resulted from his wound which he received in the service and in the line of his duty. He also says that it is well known that in very many cases mutilations received during the war have led to the habitual use of opiates, and death from an overdose taken to relieve pain consequent upon wounds is held as an accidental consequence of such wound."

The committee are fully satisfied from the evidence that the death of the soldier was not suicidal, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with amendments, as follows: Strike out in the fourth line of the bill all after the word "pension-roll" to the word "subject," in the fifth line; also all after the word "infantry" in the ninth line of the bill.

Mr. ELY. I hope, Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the committee will not be adopted, and I wish to state in a few words my reason for such hope, and in doing so I desire to say that I do not propose to antagonize the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but trust, upon the facts in this case, they will be pleased to support the bill as it was introduced by myself in the early part of this session.

The reason why this man has not had a pension, as he is shown clearly entitled to have, is on account of a blunder in the Pension Office in the first place and the neglect of Congress to pass his bill when it was favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in previous Congresses. Indeed, I will observe, this committee find, as the committees in previous Congresses have done, the reason why the claim was rejected, when it was seasonably made before the statute of limitations was passed, was because the Committee of Pensions at that time made a blunder; and I venture to affirm it was a gross and inexcusable blunder, because whoever has examined this claim has not failed to see it was a blunder.

This man early in the civil war enlisted in the Union Army, served his country faithfully for nearly four years, when he lost an arm in battle, and was discharged on account of that disability.

Mr. CONGER. What is the blunder that has been committed?

Mr. ELY. It is that the Commissioner of Pensions found that the man had committed suicide.

Mr. CONGER. Did he not?

Mr. ELY. He did not. Three committees of Congress, namely: one in the Forty-fifth Congress, one in the Forty-sixth Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-ninth Congress, have reported this bill, and all find the fact to be that he did not commit suicide.

This report says:

The committee are fully satisfied from the evidence that the death of the soldier was not suicidal; and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with amendments.

Now, sir, having had her claim rejected by the Pension Office unjustly and improperly, and as I maintain and as I believe negligently rejected, she then as soon as possible came to Congress and petitioned the Forty-fifth Congress to give her a pension, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions in that Congress recommended that she should have a pension; and their report was adopted by the present Committee on Invalid Pensions. Her case was not reached in the Forty-fifth Congress, and then she came to the Forty-sixth Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions in that Congress, in harmony with what had been done in the preceding Congress, recommended that a pension should be given to her, but for some reason or other Congress did not act upon the bill which that committee had recommended.

This woman was poor. She was the object of charity for the very necessaries of life, and she became discouraged. Having met with the fate that she did at the hands of the Government in whose defense her son had laid down his life, she omitted to come to the Forty-seventh and the Forty-eighth Congresses with her claim, and some friends of hers in this Congress came first to my friend, Mr. LOVERING, who introduced them to me, and I introduced the bill in her behalf into the House. The committee have found, in harmony with the committees of two previous Congresses, that the woman was entitled to a pension, and has been entitled to this pension all these years.

Now, I recognize the wisdom of the general rule which the Committee on Invalid Pensions have adopted for their guidance, but every rule has its exceptions, and if there is any exception to a rule which is founded upon valid reasons, upon right and justice, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is that when a person has seasonably applied for a pension to which beyond all cavil and question he was entitled, and that not through his fault but through the wrongdoing of the agents of the United States Government that pension has not been allowed, that pension has been disregarded, and sixteen or seventeen years have been allowed to elapse during which the pension has been withheld and the pensioner thrown upon the charity of the cold world all this time, I say that is an exception to the rule and one that merits our immediate consideration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. You insist that the bill should carry arrears?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. You insist also, as I understand it, that the Commissioner of Pensions made a mistake in disallowing the pension on the ground stated?

Mr. ELY. I do.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I would suggest in all kindness that this mistake ought to be rectified in the Pension Office. There is no trouble in securing this rectification on new evidence at any time. She can get a new hearing there, and if she can establish the fact as stated then she will get arrears anyhow.

Mr. ELY. After all these years to again send this poor woman back to the Pension Office to there begin the trouble anew to secure her pension would be an act of hardship and injustice. She has waited for the Pension Office to right the wrong for sixteen or seventeen years.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would desire to put her in a position where she could get arrears if she is entitled to them.

Mr. ELY. But under the present law she would not get arrears.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understood you to state that the claim was rejected on account of a mistake.

Mr. ELY. Yes, her claim was rejected because of a blunder, as I claim, in the office.

Mr. DOCKERY. But if it was a blunder it can be righted, and she would then get the arrears.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no difficulty in the world about it. I would take the contract to get such a case through the office in ten days.

Mr. WINANS. And it would carry arrears under those circumstances.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that here and now is the time and place when this woman should be righted. We have the right and the power. What reason or propriety is there in the suggestion that this woman, after all of these delays, and after all of this hardship and wrong, should be turned back into the Pension Office again? This is nothing to me; I do not even know the applicant. I never have seen her; but I know the facts, because they have been reported upon by three committees of Congress. I know the facts, because they are presented to me by respectable people in Massachusetts. Why then should she be thrown back into the office? It seems to me to be adding another hardship to what she has already suffered.

Mr. DOCKERY. But she could get the pension if the facts are as you represent them before the Pension Department in less time than you could pass this bill through Congress.

Mr. PETERS. Let me ask the gentleman a question. There are many cases in which the Pension Department decides a certain way upon a question of fact, rejecting an application for a pension. A bill is introduced into this Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions refers to the findings of the Commissioner on Pensions on the question of fact, and the pension bill is passed and the pension granted. Now there are a number of cases of that kind which have gone through the House, and it is the uniform practice of this committee not to grant arrears. Is it not the fact in this case that the Commissioner of Pensions passed upon the questions of fact as to whether this was a case of suicide, and passed upon it in such a way as to declare it to be a suicide?

An appeal was taken to this House and a bill was introduced. The Committee on Invalid Pensions say they do not believe it was suicide, and therefore recommend granting the relief sought. Now, I do not see, in all candor, that this bill should be any exception to the usual rule.

Mr. ELY. Mr. Chairman, it is substantially as the gentleman from Kansas states. But I will say this much: That this case differs from others in this respect. I do not know what any Commissioner of Pensions may say in regard to it; but this much I have to say: That when three committees of three different Congresses of the United States, with the same facts before them as the Commissioner of Pensions had, have decided in favor of this claim, I have a right to claim that the Commissioner made a mistake as to the facts. Is not that so? If any gentleman can deny that and say it is not a fair statement of the case I wish he would do so now.

Mr. PETERS. But the point I make is that the Commissioner of Pensions makes a mistake in passing on questions of fact in one-third of the cases brought to this House.

A MEMBER. Two-thirds.

Mr. PETERS. Yes, it may be in two-thirds of the cases brought to this House. I remember a case in which an application was made for a pension on account of an injury received in the Black Hawk war. The only evidence that could be obtained was that of two comrades who were illiterate and could not write and signed their names by marks. The Pension Office did not consider that sufficient evidence to affirm the question of fact necessary in the case, and therefore rejected the claim. The case was appealed to the House. In the last Congress the appeal was taken up by the Committee on Pensions, and a bill was favorably reported to the House and passed by the House. That man would have been entitled to arrears on the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because the Commissioner of Pensions made a mistake in his finding of the facts.

Mr. ELY. Not at all, if I understand the gentleman's statement of the case correctly. That was a case where the man was not satisfied with the witnesses that were produced. Now, the witnesses here were the same.

Mr. MORRILL. He was satisfied with the witnesses, but not with their evidence.

Mr. ELY. Precisely. That is where the difference lies. Now, passing by that, I wish to inquire what gentlemen have to say about the action of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, that let this poor widow go without her pension after a committee had reported favorably on her bill. Who did the wrong? Did she or did the United States Government? Whose wrong was it? And who shall bear the effects of the wrong? This unfortunate and poor widow, who lost her sole dependence in the death of her husband, as this committee find? Or shall the United States? Judge you. You have the power. You can decide it. I leave it to you to say who shall bear the burden that the wrong entailed—she who was guiltless of any wrong, or the Government, which was guilty of the whole wrong?

Now, another thing; because I do not intend to rise in my place here on a question of this sort unless I think I have some ground on which to stand. A committee of the Forty-sixth Congress reported to this House a bill in exactly the same words in which I introduced this bill in this Congress. Why did they report in favor of arrears back to 1869 unless it was right? It was because it was right, and for no other reason in the world; because they saw that here was a case that should be made an exception to the rule. And as I stated before, it is unreasonable, and I submit it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions that it is unreasonable, to establish a rule and say that there never shall under any circumstances be an exception to it.

As I have said, a committee of a former Congress reported the bill with arrears back to 1869. Why should we not adopt that bill?

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments submitted by the committee.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANN LITTLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4539) granting a pension to Ann Little; reported by Mr. LOVERING from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann Little, widow of John Little, late a private in Company A, Eleventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMILY LOUISA SPICER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5506) granting a pension to Emily Louisa Spicer.
